Decrease in overall crime rate positive sign

Manhattan is becoming a better place to live. Riley County recently released a report that showed the crime rate had dropped from 1998 to 1999, overall. Assaults, burglaries, robberies and thefts all decreased during this time. These drops indicate that the county — most likely — has become a safer place to live. There are, however, some problems with the study. Most notably, while these non-violent crimes have dropped, the number of murders and rapes rose, showing violent crime is far from a cured problem. The decrease in non-violent crimes, however, is encouraging. In addition, the increased rape statistics might not be an actual increase in the number of rapes but an increase in the number of rapes reported. If this is the case, the number of actual rapes will drop in due time.

But this will not happen on its own. Members of the community need to be aware of all of the crimes that are being committed. They need to be on the lookout for crimes of all kinds. Riley County already is below the national average for crimes per capita and already is showing signs of reducing its numbers even further. With the cooperation of community members, Manhattan and Riley County will be able to further reduce crime. If more people continue to report rapes than in the past, Manhattan will be safer, regardless of what the statistics will show. It takes small steps to improve the safety of a city, especially one that is already relatively safe. But through small steps, safety eventually will be improved.

Tolerance, acceptance of all people necessary

In response to the recent letters and opinions regarding homosexuality, I feel the need to respond. First, homosexuality is not a disease, sin or an immoral lifestyle. Just because the Bible says it is does not mean it is. Come on people, wake up. Don't let written propaganda and what other people say and think reflect on what you think. Think for yourselves. Probably most of the reason homosexuality is condemned in general is because of ignorance and fear. Homosexuality is still not fully understood since our government and society will not allow much further research on this issue. Studies strongly suggest homosexuality is genetic and not really a choice. That I will agree. As a single 23-year-old heterosexual myself and still looking for the right mature woman, a relative is gay and we just accept it. She lives a successful and productive life like most other homosexual and heterosexual people. Tolerance and acceptance of all people is the key in making this world a better place to live.

Only time will reveal if college boozing leads to alcoholism

It is funny that as children we are faced with questions that seem simple but really are capable of producing answers of many variations.

Let us think back to those Saturday mornings full of "Smurfs" and "Fat Albert and the Cosby Kids," and I believe most of you will recall the infamous question that bombarded our impressionable little minds.

Just how many licks does it take to get to the tootsie roll center of a tootsie pop?

Two?
I think not.
Sometimes I can eat a tootsie pop in two licks, or sometimes I can eat a tootsie pop in 14 licks. It just depends on the person, the day, the time, the situation. Everyone's individuality becomes apparent when deciding on how many licks it takes to get to the center of a tootsie pop.

This lead in is taking me to a question that has been bombarding my still very influential little brain as a college student.

Sitting amid all of my lovely friends at my favorite lovely bar listening to a lovely two-man band, I began wondering why it was that I was enjoying this situation so much.

The No. 1 reason that came to mind was that I really, really love being social. I love being around people. I love going out with my friends and meeting new people. I love being in a setting in which I can control what I am drinking and doing at the same time. I love going out, period. That is my individuality speaking.

I then began wondering why it was that so much hype has been raised about binge drinking on college campuses in recent years.

Is binge drinking, or drinking at all for that matter, creating a set pathway for all of us college kids to end up in Alcoholics Anonymous?

I do not see myself with the social life I have now when I am 30. I do not see myself acting as I do (very idiotic at times) now when I am 30. I do not see myself with a problem when I am 30. But do others? Society is more laid back. Students are allowed to be fairly outspoken in words and actions, so maybe this is leading to a general acceptance of behavior such as this in America.

Statistics show that as many as 360,000 of America's 12 million undergraduates ultimately will die of an alcohol-related cause. That is more than the total number of undergrads who will be awarded advanced degrees in their lives.

Forty-three percent of America's college students are defined as binge drinkers (a male who has five or more drinks in one setting or a female who has four or more drinks in one setting). So almost half of all of us are drunks? I do not understand how out of all of us individuals, a number like that can be found by one definition of a binge drinker.

Being that human beings are individuals in their own right, how can a definition of binge drinking, which simply is too vague to attach it to such a large group, be defining our age group of Americans?

Researchers say college has become a four-year party with a $20,000 cover charge.

I think that college is a time when we primarily are trying to figure out who we are as individuals, and drinking, socially or maniacally (not recommended by any means), is one of the ways that is right there for us to utilize.

I am not saying drinking is right. Recent deaths on several college campuses across the nation prove that theory wrong right away. All of us know there are consequences to this behavior, but how many of us will continue to behave in this manner when we are finished with this (Thank you, Mom and Dad) blessed experience called college? I tried to find some statistics on how many college students actually end up as alcoholics later in life and could not find a number, and I am sure one is available somewhere.

What I am saying is, I think trying to adhere everyone to one definition when everyone is so very different is not the way to go here.

I suppose there is no way to cure a problem such as this. Things can be done with the hope of a resolution, but even prohibition of alcohol would just send the behavior into a more secretive and possibly more corrosive manner.

An alcoholic is defined as someone whose drinking causes problems in some department of that person's life.

I know a lot of people who skip class because of a hangover. So are they alcoholics? I cannot justify that as an answer because some of these people are more driven in life than a skater boy is driven to drive a Jetta. I know these people will be successful in life.

This has become a harder problem for me to figure out than what the definition of irony is off the top of my head.

I guess time will bring me the answer. I just do not want an unfortunate circumstance to come along with that answer.

Some more detailed care needs to be taken in this situation because if college drinking is ever going to be controlled, generalizations cannot be the basis for a means of trying to fix it.

The Collegian's Reader Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on any topic for 20 seconds.

Jeff Elliott is not defending Christianity. He is defending homophobia. He and his ilk are one of the reasons I hate this town.

I'm really sick of all the roaches in the residence halls.

Yeah, Travis. I don't need my student fees paying someone to tell me to pull my thumb out of my butt and vote.

There were almost 3,000 people who voted last year, and there are almost 3,000 greeks. Is this a correlation? I think so. Get out there and vote, and quit whining about it.

I'm really disappointed by the lack of debate coverage. It is a school-sponsored activity, you know.

The person who decided that women should be allowed to get driver's licenses should be shot.

How about making a separate Fourum for the theologian, basketball enthusiasts?

Serve beer at Bramlage? No way. Too many greeks would start calling a basketball game a function.

It's not all Asbury's fault. He assumed his players had the simple skills — like catching the ball and throwing to the open man — but they don't.

Here's an idea. If you don't like Jeff Elliott's column, don't read it. Please stop calling the Fourum and crying because, 'Mommy, Jeffrey hurt my feelings.'

I don't think it's fair that residence hall students should have to pay more for parking next year when they're not going to even use the shuttle service.

Yeah, Ben's not here right now. Can I take a message?

Jeff Elliott's column reaffirms everyone else's beliefs that K-State students are narrow-minded bigots.

Some basketball teams have to suck, so that others can rise above. Keep Tom Asbury. Go KU.

Greek problems need fixed by people who experience them

The greek system is a joke. Members of fraternities and sororities buy their friends, haze, slip roofies into each others' drinks, and they all shop at the Gap when they're home getting beer money from their Johnson County parents.

To sum it all up: greeces are rich, sport utility-driving, violent alcoholics, sharing a common identity crisis.

This is how many of the 80 percent non-greek students at K-State feel. I know this to be true because I lived in the residence halls for a year before joining a fraternity.

When you live outside of the greek community, it is hard to understand anything about greeces. Stereotypes are prevalent and questions abundant when it comes to this strange creature called "frat guy" and "sorority chick."

Questions like, "What is this brotherhood thing, and why does it bring 60 guys to shower together?" "Do sorority girls own anything other than black pants?"

"I took a study break and went to Dara's with some friends. Should we make T-shirts?" "What happens if two teams have the same color of homecoming jacket? Do classes get canceled?"

Most greek jokes are pretty funny, and it's easy to understand why the greek system is such an easy target for parody.

However, things stop being funny when fingers start being pointed and judgments are passed, especially by people that have no knowledge of or ties to the greek system.

As a member of the fraternity system for three years, I've been around for the various hazing allegations and other ugly things that tend to circulate about the greek community.

Yes, some fraternities haze. It's disappointing and stupid, but it happens.

In defense of the greek system, it is important to point out that the word hazing can encompass almost anything.

A fraternity pledge that doesn't feel like going to mandatory study hours can run to the Interfraternity Council and claim mental discomfort if he desires. This, of course, is extreme and wouldn't likely happen, but if something like this did take place, "Fraternity Faces Hazing Allegations" would be plastered across the front page of the next day's Collegian.

Although no disciplinary action would take place, both the fraternity and the greek system as a whole would have their image tarnished.

It's almost election time, and the usual "elections are unfair because greeces sway the results by voting together" talk is being passed around.

This campus is run by greeces, and they are doing a great job.

If the rest of the student population doesn't like the leadership at K-State, then do something about it.

I bet the same people who complain about group voting in fraternities and sororities would have no problem getting a few floors in the residence halls together to vote for an independent running for office.

A lot of problems, like substance abuse, come up quite often when talking about the greek system. It's convenient to make fraternity houses the scapegoats of alcohol-related issues.

The truth is, if you want to find a party, especially on a weeknight, go to the residence halls. There is always a party going on there, especially the ones that are coed. People are pushing for greek houses to go dry, so why not make the residence halls dry? Is alcohol abuse in the dorms any better?

Alcohol abuse isn't a greek problem; it's a campus problem.

The Collegian Editorial Board recently has criticized the decision made by the IFC and Panhellenic Council to keep the Homecoming bidding process but make some changes.

Take a look at the members of the board. Only two out of the 10 are greek.

When you get a group of people together to form an opinion about something, especially the Collegian's official opinion, it's usually a bad idea to comment on a matter when 80 percent of the people making the statement have no insight on what they're talking about.

Because of IFC and Panhellenic's decision, the board calls them hypocritical. It states, "While they both have preached the importance of minimizing the effects Homecoming will have on member's academics, they refuse to rid themselves of bidding, which is the single-biggest culprit in draining time."

That's a bold statement considering the fact that only two of them have even experienced Homecoming bidding.

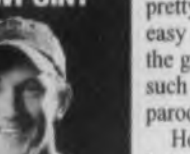

As a former Homecoming chair, I can attest to the fact that Homecoming bidding is a busy time, but nothing compared to Homecoming week.

Greeces take a lot of heat at K-State, and it's usually from people that can't get past the downsides of the greek community.

The greek system certainly has some flaws, but the positive aspects of greek organizations at K-State far outweigh the negative ones. Any problems that do exist don't need to be fixed or criticized by those that haven't been there to experience them firsthand.

Editorial Board's stance utilizes flaw-filled logic

Editor,

I had to comment on how ridiculous the logic behind your editorial really is.

The state should have no right to dictate what citizens do in matters of personal health and safety that have no bearing on other individuals.

More people die from heart problems related to eating foods high in cholesterol than die from not wearing a seat belt. Both are matters of personal health and safety that have no effect on others.

Now let me illustrate the flawed logic by rewriting your column with the change. I hope you find it as humorous as I find seat-belt laws.

Preserving their own life is not reason enough to put down potato chips for some people. It is to protect those people who have inspired state lawmakers to examine a bill that would permit law-enforcement officers to stop people who are eating greasy foods.

It is illegal to eat such foods in Kansas, but fines for this violation are given only when a stop is made for a different reason. This law would change that by permitting stops based solely on eating unhealthy.

The bill has regained momentum in the Kansas Legislature after the recent death of John Candy of a heart attack. It is unfortunate that such a tragedy must occur before such an advantageous bill could be considered.

However, since it is now being looked at, the bill should be approved.

The effect of the bill would be to penalize those who fail to put down the greasy double cheeseburgers. While this might seem to be a trivial reason to invoke a fine, what is a few dollars to the few people who forget compared to the lives it will save?

Many states already have such laws. Kansas has been slow to follow suit, but now is the time to take action.

The state's lawmakers need to look past the criticism of people who are too lazy to cook healthy foods every time they eat. It is those people, the ones who are criticizing the law, who will benefit the most in the end. This law could end up saving their lives.

I hope this doesn't cause a great push to outlaw fast foods.

Instead, take a serious look at the direction our lawmakers are headed in by passing legislation that unnecessarily restricts our personal freedoms in the name of your safety.

If it doesn't hurt others, let people do what they want to themselves.

Missouri fan off of base; Cat fans still supportive

Editor,

A recent letter to the editor by a student at the University of Missouri blasted the lack of school spirit at K-State. This student had driven to the K-State/Missouri men's basketball game with a large entourage, attended the game in a full regalia of black and gold complete with signs and admitted to calling attention to themselves by boisterous actions and supporting the actions of the infamous "Antlers," the rowdy student group sanctioned by their university community.

As a KU alumnus, I read this letter with special interest, as many in Lawrence are familiar with this attitude of some people from our sister state of Missouri.

I would specifically refute the allegations of this misguided student.

First, the support and loyalty your students, alumni and fans provide to your sports teams and school is unquestioned.

Second, contrary to the view of many, I find the degree of support for your student athletes to be admirable.

I have yet to hear specific words of irritation expressed about any men's basketball player even as the teams struggle to end the season on a positive note.

Third, while many call attention to the lack of a close to full house in Bramlage Coliseum, I would submit the continued attendance to the current level is amazing based on the fact the team is in an 11-game losing streak and on the court performance has declined for a number of years.

I believe that if my alma mater were in a similar position and were faced with like struggles, then Allen FieldHouse would be empty, too.

There will again be brighter basketball days on your campus again. What goes around comes around. Keep the faith.

Women's tennis earns season's 3rd shutout

By DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The No. 50 K-State women's tennis squad shut out Wichita State, 9-0, Sunday afternoon to collect its fifth victory of the season, tying the team's win total for the entire 1999 season in its seventh match this season.

"There's really no comparison to last year," K-State head coach Steve Bietau said. "Any comparisons to last year are meaningless."

The defeat of the Shockers at Ahearn Field House marked K-State's third shutout of the season.

The Wildcats got off to a slow start in doubles competition, dropping five games at No. 1 and No. 3. The Shockers also pushed junior Eva Novotna' and freshman Petra Sedlmajerova to a tie-breaker in No. 2 doubles play before K-State prevailed, 9-8.

"We played poorly in doubles," Bietau said. "Maybe we just took them a little bit lightly and weren't emotionally ready to play."

K-State junior tennis player Eva Novotna' attempts to return the ball to a player from Creighton earlier in the season in the Cottonwood Racquetball Club.

Despite the early struggles, the Cats refused to yield a set in singles play en route to six straight-set victories, including five sets by a score of 6-0. K-State won a colossal 19 of the first 20 games in singles play.

"They responded extremely well," Bietau said. "I think we made a bit of a statement."

"And with the format we play now with the tie breaker, it puts a lot more pressure on the player who wins the first set. You have to maintain that momentum, and I think we did that as well. Although we were somewhat flat in doubles, we were very sharp in singles."

Sedlmajerova, ranked No. 54 in the latest NCAA rankings, had the toughest singles match of the day, defeating Annelie Van den Heever, 6-4, 6-2, to remain unbeaten in spring singles action.

"Her drive is very strong," Bietau said of Sedlmajerova. "I'm not to sure about confidence level — she really didn't play too well this weekend."

With the victory, K-State improved to 5-2 on the season, while Wichita State fell to 0-3.

Meanwhile, in Friday's non-conference action, the Cats got a close victory over No. 60 Tulsa, 6-3.

K-State won three out of four tie breakers to edge Tulsa at Ahearn Field House.

The Cats led 2-1 after doubles play, following a Sedlmajerova/Novotna' come-from-behind tie-breaker victory, 9-8 (7-3), at No. 2 doubles over Jennifer DeSpain and Marjolein van Dongen.

"Winning two out of three doubles matches was huge," Bietau said. "We were behind at No. 2 and came back to win, and the No. 1 match was very close as well."

Jecminkova won the see-saw battle, 8-6, over Monica Poveda and Jana Sedivec.

The Cat tandem successfully reversed its result against the Tulsa duo that defeated them in November's regional competition.

Against Tulsa, K-State responded at the turning point of singles play, winning two third-set tie breakers at No. 3 and No. 4 singles to clinch the match.

Novotna' lost the first set to Sedivec but bounced back to take the second set 6-3 and the tie breaker 10-4.

Pampoulova then clinched the match with a deciding 17-15 tie-breaker victory at No. 3, after splitting the first two sets with Aleksandra Durksa.

"If things had gone slightly different, we could've been in some trouble," Bietau said.

The Cats will not return to the court until March 3, when K-State will travel to Wisconsin to face the Badgers and Brigham Young.

Bietau said it will be important to take advantage of the break.

"I think it's a critical break, given the schedule when we start up again," he said.

K-State adds coach to staff

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State football program has added a new coach. K-State head coach Bill Snyder announced Monday the hiring of Stan Clayton to the staff. He will be a graduate assistant coach, and Clayton's responsibilities will include working with offensive line coach Paul Dunn.

Snyder said Clayton will work well in the K-State system.

"Stan will be a great addition to our staff," Snyder said. "Both his playing and coaching experience will have an impact on the young men he will work with. Stan, along with Darren Holmes, give us what I would consider to be two of the finest graduate assistant coaches in college football."

Clayton has an extensive background in college and professional football. He graduated from Penn State University in 1988. In 1986, Clayton helped Penn State win a national championship. In 1987, he earned honorable-mention All-American honors.

He also played in the NFL for six seasons with four different teams, before entering the coaching ranks. Clayton's coaching experience includes stints as an assistant at Penn State and the University of Massachusetts.

Most recently, he coached at Alabama State University as the school's offensive line coach and recruiting coordinator.

Women golfers set team record

By DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Marking an all-time team-best for 36 holes, the K-State women's golf squad shot a 617 en route to a sixth place finish Sunday at the Mountain View Collegiate in Tucson, Ariz.

The previous record of 638 was set April 6-7, 1998, at the Fighting Camel Classic in Buies Creek, N.C.

Sophomore Edie Murdoch led the Cats in Arizona, shooting a 76 in both rounds to tie for 10th place at the par 72 Mountain View Golf Course.

Lindsay Hammerschmidt, sophomore, also added a 76 in Sunday's action, which tied the low round of her career. Her 18th place tie with freshmen teammates Elise Carpenter and Miranda Smith also was her personal best.

K-State head coach Kristi Knight said she felt pretty good after day one of the tournament, in which the Cats sat seventh after 18 holes, with Murdoch and Carpenter in a five-way tie for 11th place.

"It was a pretty good start to the spring season," Knight said. "We scored a 311, and that could have been better."

"Miranda didn't feel like she played very well. Edie didn't hit the ball very well, but she scored pretty well. So it was an encouraging start."

Oklahoma finished first in the 10-team field, six of which were Big 12 schools, with 295 points.

The women's squad is back in action on Feb. 27 at the Edwina Watts Carolinas Collegiate in Pinehurst, N.C.

Meanwhile, Tim Norris and the K-State men's squad will compete in day-two of its spring opener today at the Southwest Classic in Victoria, Texas.

Women's basketball team must rebound to play Oklahoma

The schedule doesn't get any easier for the K-State women's basketball team.

After completing a four-game stretch that included three road games and two ranked opponents, the Cats (12-14, 5-8) face their seventh ranked foe of the year in No. 20 Oklahoma (20-6, 10-3) at 7:05 tonight in Bramlage Coliseum.

During the recent four-game stretch, K-State compiled a 3-1 mark, but the lone loss occurred last Saturday against the University of Kansas. After the Cats had shown marked improvement in all areas of the game in the previous three games, KU's pressure defense forced from K-State the sort of play the Cats had hoped they left behind.

As bad as the performance in Lawrence was, K-State still might be able to find positives to use against Oklahoma, junior guard Kim Woodlee said.

"A game like that can probably come in handy down the stretch," Woodlee said. "You can find out what you need to work on."

When preparing for Oklahoma, which owns a share of the conference lead despite two straight losses, the Cats should not base their offensive game plans around the KU game. K-State's performance against the Jayhawks probably is not reflective of its normal play, head coach Deb Patterson said.

"I'd like to think we're better than we played," Patterson said. "I don't necessarily think we're quite as poor offensively as we might looked in the game."

Following K-State's 24-turnover, 35-percent shooting performance against the Jayhawks' pressure defense, the Cats will be forced to re-evaluate their press break, however. The solution might be simple, though, Woodlee said.

"A lot of it is just aggressiveness," Woodlee said.

K-State will have to play aggressive on the defensive end as well. Oklahoma leads the Big 12 in scoring, and its 80 points per game average is a total K-State has reached only three times this season. The Sooners also average nearly 50 percent shooting from the field.

Individually, the Oklahoma offense features the Big 12's leading scorer, senior forward Phylesha Whaley, who averages more than 20 points a game. Although she is dangerous, K-State will not be able to focus solely on Whaley.

In Oklahoma's 86-81 loss to Texas Tech, three players combined for 69 points, and Whaley was only the team's third leading scorer. Sophomore guard/forward Stacey Dales scored 22, and sophomore guard LaNeisha Caufield added a game-high 29 points.

Oklahoma can be equally dangerous, playing a scoring power like the Sooners does, oddly, have one advantage for K-State.

The Cats will be forced to recover quickly from the Kansas game and look ahead, K-State forward Nicky Ramage said.

"You have to put this behind you," Ramage said. "We have to play Oklahoma, and they're a great ball team."

VIEWPOINT

against Texas on March 4, will be Asbury's final game on the K-State sideline in Bramlage Coliseum.

Even with that in mind, I simply can't feel sorry for Asbury any longer. Bad things happen to good guys, and moving on when you can't find a way to win is just a part of being a coach. It isn't pretty, but it's business.

I've supported Asbury in the past. I've rallied on guys who called for the firing of Asbury. After all, last year K-State won 20 games and were winning games at home.

This year, the critics are back, and I just don't know that I can fault them for putting Asbury's job in their crosshairs.

K-State won't win 20 games. They might not win 10 games.

They lose at home with the same regularity that they lose on the road. The play is sloppy. Turnovers are commonplace.

This school has lost its faith in Asbury's ability to coach the basketball team.

While I don't feel sorry for Asbury, I do feel sorry for Tony Kitt, Josh Reid and the other seniors.

These guys are playing their hearts out and have to spend the remainder of their collegiate careers getting pelted with questions about Asbury's job and their feelings about the coaching staff.

That's whom I feel for.

The players who have to bear the brunt of the pressure and the stress that accompanies the position they're in. They should be relishing their last few contests, not dreading them.

We all know Asbury can coach defense. He's proven it. But what about offense. This year's team has far more offense potential than last year's team, but what has come of it?

Sure, I get fired up when I see Kitt tearing rebounds off the rafters and when the K-State defense snuffs out low-post threats.

But offense sells tickets.

Offense makes the fans come back. Forget the whole "fair-weather fan" debate, because no matter how you slice it, a losing team will not fill up Bramlage Coliseum. A team that loses and has little, if any, offensive firepower won't even fill up the cheap seats.

Show up for K-State's final home game, and show the seniors your support. They have put up with more than should be asked from any group of players.

They also know that the game against Texas won't just be a farewell for the seniors. It likely will be a farewell to Coach Asbury; for better or for worse, it likely will signal a new era in K-State men's basketball.

Let's just hope that the new era is one we all can support.

Christopher McLemore is a senior in political science. You can e-mail him at clm1182@ksu.edu.

Asbury needs more than advice book to save job as K-State's men's basketball coach

I'm just guessing that there isn't a "How to Coach D-I Basketball" handbook that Tom Asbury can turn to.

There's no chapter titled "How to save your job as coach when you haven't been to the NCAA tourney, you've lost 11 straight conference games and your team has less offensive output than the Bangladesh National soccer team"

If there were such a book, I'm pretty sure I know what it wouldn't recommend.

It wouldn't suggest that you bench one of your best shooters when every fan who hasn't deserted your team is screaming for the athletics director to give you the ax.

That's not how struggling coaches are supposed to keep their job.

If that book is out there, it appears that

K-State men's basketball coach Tom Asbury hasn't read it, because on Saturday, he suspended guard Galen Morrison for the rest of the season, he watched his team lose its 11th consecutive game and he got so frustrated he was called for a technical foul in the second half.

This is not the path of a confident coach.

From all angles, it appears that K-State's home finale against Texas on March 4, will be Asbury's final game on the K-State sideline in Bramlage Coliseum.

Even with that in mind, I simply can't feel sorry for Asbury any longer. Bad things happen to good guys, and moving on when you can't find a way to win is just a part of being a coach. It isn't pretty,

Health QUESTION

By: Carole A. Diamond
Staff assistant at Latene Health Center

Q: If people drink a can of pop a day, how much weight can they potentially gain?

A: The average 12-ounce can of soda contains 150-180 calories. Whether the calories come from pop or fat-free foods, an additional 150-180 calories per day over a six- to 12-month period (depending on the person's metabolism) can cause a 15-pound weight increase.

When individuals who drink several pops per day are bemoaning weight gain, most practitioners will try to suggest ways empty calories can be replaced so weight loss might be less painful. On average, reducing caloric intake by 100 calories per day can generate a 10-pound weight loss per year.

STORY BY JAINA K. STUTHEIT ■ PHOTOS BY KELLY GLASSCOCK

Yoga is exercise for the mind. Ana Franklin, yoga instructor at the Meditation Center and Mercy Health Center on Sunset Avenue, said the exercise focuses on getting the most out of life.

"Yoga is an all-encompassing art of living your life in harmony with nature," Franklin said.

Franklin, who has been practicing yoga for 25 years, said the activity is estimated to be 3,000-5,000 years old. She said some of the first people to practice yoga were called rishis, or sages.

The rishis were people who studied asceticism as wisdom and how nature works. Rishis understood nature by being still and paying attention. This practice came to be known as meditation.

"By being very still, they developed a deep understanding of nature," Franklin said.

Yoga is different from regular exercise in that it is more of a conversation with your inner self, Franklin said.

"Yoga is the ceasing of the disturbance of the mind," she said.

Bharathi Narayanan, graduate student in mathematics, has been practicing yoga for about six years. He has taught yoga classes at UFM and at the K-State Student Union.

Narayanan said there are four branches of yoga that are complementary to each other, with physical exercise as a small part of yoga. The four types are Hatha yoga, Bhakti yoga, Karma yoga and Jnana yoga.

Hatha yoga is exercising and developing the body, mind and breath. It also deals with concentration and meditation.

Bhakti yoga is devotion to a higher power. This type of yoga includes prayer, chanting, singing and music rituals.

Karma yoga is yoga of selfless action. Narayanan said this type of yoga can be practiced by anyone.

"Someone who doesn't practice yoga exercises and meditation can do Karma yoga and be helping others," he said.

The other type of yoga, Jnana yoga, is yoga of knowledge and wisdom.

Narayanan said he practices yoga every morning.

"Yoga is the best way to keep in touch with my inner self every day, and it helps me to rest in inner space," he said.

Narayanan said he recently has formed a registered yoga group on campus called Integral Yoga Group. He said it has not found a place to meet yet, but once it does, the group will have weekly meetings and other activities.

"The goal of the group is to create communion among people who are interested in a complete and balanced life," he said.

Franklin said she begins her classes by giving a short chant to focus everyone's minds. She then checks in with each student to see how they are doing.

"I try to keep my classes small, with a maximum of 10 students, so that it's more personal," she said. "I like to encourage a repertoire between the students."

After Franklin has checked in with each student, the class practices postures for an hour. The last 20 minutes of class are spent doing breathing exercises and chanting.

Franklin said she doesn't teach meditation because she feels it happens naturally as a result of the practice. She said she knows this happens when students tell her how yoga makes them feel.

"I recently had a student tell me that once she had been doing yoga, she felt happier in her heart and body, and that everything in her life was going better," she said. "That's how I know the meditation has happened."

Franklin said although the health benefits of yoga are real, she was reluctant to make any statements because she wants people to come and experience them for themselves.

"Come and try a class. If you like it, stick with it," she said.

Franklin said yoga also has spiritual benefits. She said there is no differentiation between you as a person and you as a spirit.

"You are a seamless person," she said. "All is one. If you do what's healthful for your body, your spirit will respond. If you do what's healthful for your spirit, your body will respond."

Kristy Prosser, one of Franklin's students, has been practicing yoga for about a year and a half. She said she practices yoga every day.

"Personal practice is directed more toward spirituality, but there are also physical and mental benefits," Prosser said.

Prosser said she practiced yoga at Sirananda, an Ashram in Grass Valley, Calif. An Ashram is a place where people stay and practice yoga religiously. Prosser said she was there for a month.

"It was the total yoga experience," she said. "We did yoga from morning until night."

Narayanan said yoga can benefit all people if they set aside a few minutes each day for the exercise.

"Most people think yoga is hard, and they can't do it," Narayanan said. "Anyone can do yoga, you just have to put aside 15 minutes of your day. It's like a personal interview with yourself."

Spring motivates students' workout plans

BY TARYN FORT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Many students will be hitting the beaches or hiking in the mountains in just a few weeks.

With spring break on the way, students are becoming concerned with their appearance and health. The time to take New Year's resolutions seriously is now.

"The combination of New Year's resolutions and spring break results in many students coming in and starting a new workout regimen," said Lori Strack, graduate student in wellness and Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex employee. "The fact that it is difficult for some people to schedule a time for working out results in many students coming in at all times of the day."

Students who are busy with classes sometimes are finding themselves exercising at different times during the day. Although it is not recommended to exercise late at night, it is entirely up to the individual on whether one should be working out before going to bed.

"Of course, working out late is going to raise the heart rate and bodily functions will be more difficult to unwind, but exercising is an such a personal level that everyone is different," Craig Harms, assistant professor of kinesiology, said. "It simply works better for some to be working out after 10 o'clock at night. Daily schedules can become difficult to fit exercise into."

Other reasons why some students have begun to work out later in the evening could be in correlation with a study break, a need to wake themselves up or even the weather.

"Students that are up late studying would have it in their best interest to do some sort of physical activity instead of ordering a pizza," Harms said. "The food is only going to make them more drowsy in the end. This mild weather and people's preference to not work out in crowded conditions may also be factors that are causing more people to be out and about."

Spring also brings the need to simply feel more healthy. Jennifer Cox, senior in illustration, said.

"I began working out again recently to give myself an energy boost from the winter weather and to just feel a little healthier," she said.

Figuring out the best way to get into shape and be more healthy can be dealt with on a professional level, even if one is a student.

"At the recreation center, we provide wellness consultations for any card holder that is wanting to begin an entire workout regimen or just work on something more specific in relation to the body," Strack said. "We cater to everyone on a personal preference level. We take a look at what the goal of the individual is and map out an assessment plan for them to adhere to."

Of course, the key to becoming more healthy does not lie only within exercise. Eating habits go hand in hand with getting fit.

"Depending upon when a person is going to be working out, their eating patterns must be taken into consideration," Harms said. "If someone prefers to work out in the morning, grab some juice or something low in fat before working out."

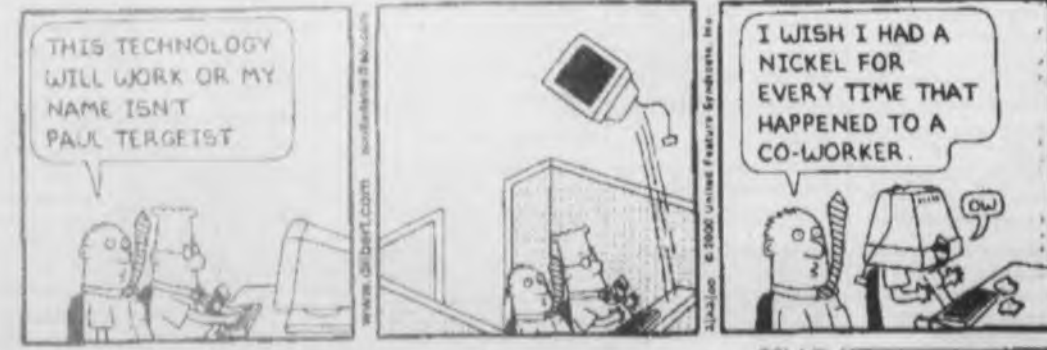

"If you are working out late in the evening, it is probably better to avoid eating dinner until after working out. The body will digest better this way. Anytime someone is going to work out any time of the day they should probably not eat for an hour before they exercise."

publishing a book, which is research of my own."

Michie said if she wanted to put her notes online, she could use her department Web page through K-State's home page.

"I don't see any reason why you need to go through a commercial Web site," she said.

Michie said she wants students to come to class rather than rely on a synopsis of the lecture.

"People's notes aren't really the lecture, after all," she said. "I'm not sure if you can get the whole gist of what is really happening."

Blackford, sophomore in business administration, said only about five instructors have given their permission so far.

If at least 20 instructors give permission to Versity.com to have their notes on its site, Blackford said K-State might be back on Versity.com by the fall semester, and he will continue his position as campus operations manager.

Blackford said he has received about 75 applications from students to take notes, and he has received several e-mails asking why K-State notes can't be accessed through Versity.com.

Blackford said he is glad that Versity.com and K-State have made an agreement, but he doesn't think students should have to have the instructor's permission.

"When you take notes in class, it's your interpretation," he said. "The teachers don't own information."

Several Kansas colleges and universities have notes on the site.

Coffman said K-State isn't the only university that has had an issue with sites like Versity.com.

"UCLA, I know, had a major confrontation with the same company and with the same issues," he said. "There are others that I have followed, too."

The office of the provost at the University of Kansas has issued a statement that is on its Web site about commercial note-taking ventures.

It states that the KU's Code of Student Rights, Responsibilities and Conduct "permits you (faculty members) to prohibit an enrolled student from making commercial use of your lectures ... Any close reproduction of a faculty member's lecture, such as is constituted by good class notes, is a use of property which, at the very least, belongs to the faculty member, who because of copyright laws may distribute, produce and prepare derivative works from lectures."

the system runs, and it gives you incentive and shows you how to improve," she said.

"The awards are given to the best overall, well-rounded council that exemplifies excellence in all areas," McClellan said.

For Goodpasture, the main benefit of the conference is learning about the weaknesses within the system and learning how to address them.

"Last year we only won seven out of eight awards — we didn't get the self-governance and judicial affairs," Goodpasture said. "It became obvious we were weak in that area so we put a lot of time into making improvements."

"Next year we will have to look at our weaknesses and improve them," he said.

Although Panhellenic Council did not win the Sutherland, McClellan said the meaning behind putting together all the programs and notebooks makes the process worthwhile.

Each year a new council is elected at the conference to run the MGCA. Phil Stein, junior in political science and Lambda Chi Alpha member, was elected the new president of the council.

"It is a huge honor to represent K-State," Stein said.

Stein decided to run for the presidency because he said he saw the problems other greek systems were having and how they were similar to K-State's.

"I have ideas on how to work with issues we are facing and deal with them on a nationwide level," he said.

Stein's duties will include overseeing the five vice presidents in the council, managing MGCA operations and interacting with other IFCs.

Aside from winning awards and obtaining offices, the councils' presidents said the conference is a good way to interact with other schools.

Stein said K-State's greek system serves as a model for other systems around the country.

"Other schools look to K-State as a source for answers for progressive new ways for their greek systems and in dealing with greek issues," he said. "It definitely shows our greek system is advanced and successful."

Kansas lawmakers consider bill to check teachers' past

TOPEKA — Local school boards would have to conduct criminal-history records checks of teachers and others they want to hire under a bill being considered by the Senate Education Committee.

On Tuesday, the committee considered the bill to require school boards to run the checks and take fingerprints of those being hired. It took no action on the bill.

The bill would require background checks of anybody being hired by a school board, but would not include independent contractors, such as school-bus drivers.

Sponsoring Sen. John Vratil said the bill is "just one more arrow in the quiver of measures we can use to try to protect our children."

Vratil, R-Leawood, said the FBI charges $41 for each records check. He said school boards or those being hired would pay the cost.

However, some committee members questioned whether such checks are necessary.

Chairwoman Barbara Lawrence, R-Wichita, asked Vratil to see if it is possible to exempt applicants who have lived in Kansas their entire lives.

Vratil said he thinks the FBI will not conduct records checks unless school boards require them on everyone hired.

Organizers continue effort to complete Capitol dome

SALINA, Kan. — Organizers have raised nearly $250,000 to place Salina artist Dick Bergen's "Ad Astra" sculpture on the Kansas Capitol dome.

It's a start toward the more than $1 million needed to complete the project, said Carolee Jones, president of Ad Astra Inc., the nonprofit fund-raising organization for the project.

Bergen is ready to cast the pieces that will become the 20-foot statue of a Kansas Indian pointing a bow and arrow skyward. The sculpture's name comes from the state motto, "Ad astra per aspera," which means "To the stars through difficulties."

The large wax molds that will form the statue lie about Bergen's studio and art gallery.

Costs of getting the sculpture to the top of the dome include having engineers supervise construction, engineering surveys and insurance and erecting scaffolding for workers to install a base on the crown of the dome for the finished statue.

There also is the cost of a helicopter or large crane to lift the 4,000-pound sculpture 300 feet up in the air.

"Ad Astra" was created by Bergen 10 years ago as the winning design in a competition sponsored by the Kansas Arts Commission.

The competition was for the design of a statue to top the copper-plated dome, which was finished in 1903.

Legislation specified that private money fund the project.

Late last year the fund-raising committee got a boost when an anonymous donor provided $25,000, Jones said. There have been several $5,000 and $10,000 contributions as well, she said.

Fund-raising efforts include selling commemorative bricks for a plaza at the capitol in Topeka.

Bergen also is working on creating a new series of miniature versions of "Ad Astra," which will be sold to raise money for the project. Sen. Ben Vidricksen, R-Salina, who introduced the legislation to build the Capitol plaza, plans to travel statewide after the session ends to solicit donations.

Officer accused of allowing injured bank robber to die

LOS ANGELES — A detective testified Tuesday that he believes a bank robber wounded in a fierce shootout on the streets of North Hollywood in 1997 deliberately moved around to make himself to bleed to death.

James Vojtecky said he whispered to a fellow officer: "Don't let this man move. He's trying to bleed out on us. He's trying to kill himself."

Vojtecky testified in a federal civil-rights lawsuit that accuses police of letting the wounded gunman, Emil Matasareanu, die by delaying medical help. Matasareanu was shot 29 times in the gun battle.

The lawsuit was brought on behalf of the dead man's children against Vojtecky, another officer and the city.

When asked if he tried to help the bleeding suspect commit suicide, Vojtecky replied: "That's the last thing I wanted to do."

During the gun battle, Matasareanu, 30, and Larry Eugene Phillips Jr., 26, wore full body armor and fired automatic weapons at officers armed mostly with handguns.

Maenche, Karimi announce run for presidential office

By TANNER EHMKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The campus has heard their voices over the airwaves. Now, Drew Maenche and Ali Karimi, both juniors in electronic journalism, want to listen to what the students have to say.

SGA ELECTIONS
2000

Maenche and Karimi announced their candidacy for student body president and vice president Tuesday at the KSDB-FM 91.9 campus radio station. The candidates are running on the slogan "Everyday Solutions for Everyday Students."

"We're running a grassroots campaign," Maenche said. "We're not about crowds or money."

Maenche and Karimi are not alien to experience.

Maenche, who has been the music director at the station for three years, and Karimi, who has been the music archivist for a year and a half, said they are not about spending money or for expanding their résumés. They want to sit down and listen to students and their issues.

"SGA doesn't have enough people represented," Maenche said. "We need new blood into the system. We're in this campaign to try to get things changed around."

The radio veterans' platform focuses on issues for the students: a student mass-transit system, helping student organizations, lowering tuition rates, creating a fall break and qualifying graduate teaching assistants.

"A number of GTAs speak bad English, or don't know how to help," Maenche said. "We propose a formal test or verbal test to qualify them."

The candidates said a parking garage is a short-term solution for a long-term problem of campus parking.

Within five to 10 years, another garage might have to be built, Maenche said.

Other universities provide a mass-transit system for their students, Karimi said. It is the most economical choice available. Traffic would be reduced on smaller streets, he said. The route also could run through

They said not enough is going back to the students with the record enrollments. More money needs to be sent to programs that could use it, such as Union Program Council, Black Student Union and club sports.

"Club sports are ignored," Karimi said. "They don't have any formal practice fields. We want to help them out."

Maenche and Karimi, who both pay out-of-state tuition, also want to see where their money goes when there is an increase in tuition. The pair proposed that the university show a breakdown in percentages of where the increases go.

"We want to know why they raised tuition rates," Maenche said. "There might be a better way to spend the money."

Committee endorses stricter seat-belt law

By JOHN HANNA
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — A bill that would increase the fine for not wearing a seat belt won the endorsement Tuesday of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

The bill is much weaker than a proposal from Gov. Bill Graves to strengthen the state's seat-belt law. Graves backed away from that plan and offered a compromise, but the committee did not accept it.

As endorsed by the committee, the bill would raise the fine for not wearing a seat belt from $10 to $25. As under current law, only drivers and front-seat passengers could be ticketed, and only if law-enforcement officers stopped their vehicle for another violation, such as speeding.

The committee endorsed its proposal on a voice vote, with only Sen. Ed Pugh, R-Wamego, voting no. Pugh said his constituents overwhelmingly oppose any change in the law, viewing it as an infringement upon their liberties.

The bill went to the entire Senate for debate, which gave solace to Senate President Dick Bond, the only committee member who expressed public support for Graves' original plan.

"We didn't get what I wanted, but we did get a bill moving, and maybe it can get prettier," said Bond, R-Overland Park. "As long as it has life, there's hope for improvement."

Dan Hermes, Graves' chief legislative liaison, saw the committee's vote as progress in strengthening the seat belt law.

"Anything that encourages people to use seat belts is a good thing," Hermes said. "An increase in the fine will encourage people to wear seat belts."

Graves made strengthening the seat belt law one of his top legislative priorities — to the surprise of many legislators.

Under current law, all drivers and front-seat passengers over the age of 14 must wear a seat belt. However, violating the law is a secondary traffic offense, meaning officers must stop and ticket a driver for something else first.

A separate law covers children. All passengers between 4 and 14 must wear seat belts, and those under 4 must be in child safety seats. A motorist can be stopped solely because a child is not properly restrained.

Graves originally proposed allowing law enforcement officers to stop motorists simply for not wearing their seat belts. Also, his plan would have applied to all passengers over 14, not just those in the front seat.

Chairman Tim Emert said it was clear that Graves' original proposal would not get out of committee. Emert, R-Independence, scheduled a debate two weeks ago but postponed it.

He offered the governor's latest compromise. It would have increased the fine to $25 and allowed law enforcement officers to forgo ticketing someone for another offense before ticketing someone for not wearing a seat belt.

Thus, if an officer stopped someone for speeding, he could issue a warning ticket for speeding, then cite someone for not wearing a seat belt.

"I don't think it's going to have much of an impact, one way or the other," Emert said.

Online voting leads campaigners to seek increase in turnout

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Campaigning kicks off next week for the student body elections, and campaign managers and presidential hopefuls are looking for ways to reach students who might have been overlooked in the past.

Because of easier access to voting, students who have not voted in the past might be more apt to vote this year, increasing voter turnout, officials said.

All of the 2000-01 Student Governing Association voting will take place online through KATS.

"It definitely changes the election," said Travis Lenkner, campaign manager for Jake Worcester, student body presidential candidate and Dana Pracht, vice presidential candidate. "We know it's going to be different. We just don't know how different."

Lenkner said Worcester and Pracht are trying to talk to as many people as they can. Besides the regular visits to residence halls and greek organizations, they also are visiting many campus organizations where they can catch more people who might not have been reached in the past.

"There are a lot more people in University Commons or who live on Thurston Street who are going to vote this year, or so we hope," he said.

Along with many other presidential tickets, Lenkner said Worcester and Pracht have put up a Web site to try to get their message to more people.

Jeremy Claeys, student body presidential candidate, and Amy Metzinger, vice presidential candidate, also have a Web site explaining their platform.

Kim Peschka, Claeys and Metzinger's campaign manager, said a Web site is one way to get more people involved in the election process.

Peschka said Claeys and Metzinger have talked about trying to reach more off-campus people, but they have not made any definite plans yet.

"It's kind of hard to target off-campus people," she said. "I know, personally, if someone came around door to door to my apartment, it would turn me off."

Rick Wooten, student body presidential candidate, said he thinks people who have not voted in the past will vote this year because it is online.

"This gives them a better chance to get that voting done," he said.

Wooten said because of online voting it is important to reach out to more students, but he said he already is accomplishing that goal in one way.

"I think our issues reach out to a broad base of people already," he said.

Robin Cates, campaign manager for Jesse McCurry, student body presidential candidate, and Kylo Heller, vice presidential candidate, said despite the new online voting, their campaign will be focusing on many of the same things candidates focus on every year.

"We'll be dealing with how to increase voter turnout," she said. "The key is you have to reach a group of students who wouldn't normally be reached."

Cates said the key to getting a good turnout is publicizing online voting so all students know they can vote that way.

"I think because it's convenient, we definitely have the availability to increase voter turnout," she said. "My only concern is that it's not as visible. You have to take time to stop at a computer and get online."

Zeb Larson, campaign manager for Steve Hall and Ryan Hoskinson, said he does not think their campaign style will change that much because of online voting.

"As far as campaigning, we're still trying to keep it a personal level," he said. "The more personal way is the way to go."

"My only concern is that it's not as visible. You have to take time to stop at a computer and get online"

K-State campus not ready for increasing enrollment

You might think the rising enrollment at K-State is a good sign.

You might be wrong.

While the increased number of students enrolled at K-State is positive in some ways — with it, K-State will receive additional funds for financial aid — it has a downside that is creeping up to tarnish any benefits.

To begin with, departments are struggling to find instructors to offer the quantity and variety of classes students need. Because of budget cutbacks, some classes might have to be dropped. More students and less class sections are not a good mix.

The state of advising at K-State is pathetic. While some advisers certainly do an outstanding job and genuinely care about those students they advise, there are just as many advisers who suffer through 10 minutes per semester with students only because they are required to do so. So little time and so little effort is of no benefit for students trying to complete college and, eventually, enter the job market.

In addition, the residence halls soon will need some attention. Students are being crammed in like never before and, if this influx of new students is sustained, a place for them to live on campus must be found.

Basements already are occupied in some buildings, and more space must be found somehow.

There are many other smaller details that need to be dealt with, as well. The parking mess, which shows only occasional signs of hope, only will worsen with more people searching for the same number of spots.

► OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

Football tickets, already scarce, will be next to impossible to find.

Classrooms will become even more packed, and students will get even less one-on-one attention from their instructors.

K-State clearly is not prepared for a continued enrollment onslaught.

Before K-State can welcome new students and expect to benefit them, it first must adapt to take care of its current students.

altruism OBSTACLES

People should learn to lead generous lives, not reflect on bad things that happen to everyone

I always thought after we crossed the threshold of the year 2000, people would start to die en masse.

I figured there was some sort of psychological pull, getting people to cross that milestone, that drive, just to see what a day in the year 2000 was like.

Well, it's here, and it sucks just like every other year. But the flood of fatalities from those still clinging to life didn't happen. Not in January, anyway.

I don't know how your February's been, but personally, I find it amazing that there still are people left alive. Every time I call home someone new has shuffled off that ol' mortal coil. My father went to three funerals in as many days — and he hates funerals. He left the state and got called back for, yep, another funeral. We're in the final act of "Hamlet" (or maybe "Titus Andronicus") here, and the bodies are piling up so fast it's almost comical.

The past few weeks have been hard, I know, on a national level. Charles Schulz, Derrick Thomas, Tom Landry, Jim Varney ... OK, so the man wasn't Sir Anthony Hopkins, but while he was stooping to that lowest common denominator, he was doing so in the name of humor, and y'know, I can appreciate that. I just feel really sorry for him because he died the same weekend as Schulz and Landry, two literal legends in their fields, and, well, the lack of attention paid almost can make your heart break, even if you thought he was an irredeemable rube.

Taking a look at that list, though ... the good Thomas did for the community of Kansas City has been well-documented by local media, and few people stood as strongly for their God as they did their professions as Schulz and Landry. Varney, well, even if the worst that you can say about the man is "He didn't mean any harm," that's still saying something.

Point being? If you, in your worst Keystone Light-induced fit of rage, jotted down your list of the 5 billion people on Earth who should die, odds are you wouldn't have these four on it, unless you're halfway through "Ernest Goes to Camp" or your last name happens to be "Elway," in which case you have my undying pity. Maybe the world needs people to start dying. But why these people?

Why do bad things happen to good people?

If you're strong in your faith or have no faith at all, the question's meaningless. Those armor-clad in indefatigable faith are content in knowing that rewards for all the good done on Earth come after death and that the material and physical world is irrelevant, only a test of faith. Those who don't believe at all, well, there's no "why" at all. Life sucks, get a helmet.

For those of us stuck in between, though, it's a hard question to ask, and even harder to answer.

The conceit of it struck me, as stray thoughts often do, walking to campus. You didn't hear Thomas cursing God, claiming his anti-literacy programs should give him a "get out of wheelchair free" card. And why should he? His support of the Third and Long program didn't hinge on the clause that, someday, his generosity would help him walk again. It was given freely, no strings attached, no markers to be called in later.

Maybe part of it ties back to that whole idea that our benevolence on Earth is a key to rewards in the afterlife.

Why? Suddenly, every benevolent act takes the spin of being a blatant attempt to score brownie points with God. I figure, why bother?

If you're going to walk the real altruistic walk, here's what you can expect.

Give freely of yourself every day. Do your best. Be kind. Go out of your way to help others, make them laugh, make them feel good about themselves and where they find themselves. Do an extraordinary thing for someone you don't know. Give extravagantly of yourself, but don't whisper a word of the cost.

Do these things without the expectation of a reward. Don't even think that you'll be noticed. Expect to be ignored or completely unnoticed. March through with the assurance that nothing you do will be commented upon, noticed or ever remembered.

Because someday you won't be. You'll give and give and give, and it'll all just disappear, and you'll feel crushed, and you'll think you're going to just fold up upon yourself because of everything you did — for nothing. And you'll feel that void, that hollowness beating inside. This happens when you make that pretense of altruism when all you wanted was something in return. You don't need to feel this way. Trust me, you don't.

If you're going to give of yourself — give freely, go all the way. Don't expect anything on Earth. Hell, expect to get kicked in the teeth for your efforts. Don't be surprised if God forgets to jot it down somewhere. Don't do it for recompense. Do it because it needs doing. Maybe you're the only one who can. Maybe you're the only one who cares. Give. If you get something back, hey, bonus. If not, well, these things happen. And they happen to the best of us. Sometimes they just happen, and sometimes we beg them to.

Why do good things happen to bad people? Not because they can but because they have to.

Just remember that path of altruism is a rocky one. It takes more determination and patience than most people are capable of bearing. Just don't do it half-assed. You'll hate yourself.

Me, I'm not going down that road anymore. Way I figure, someone's got to kick the other losers in the teeth.

Anti-gay columns preach unnecessary prejudices

When did K-State become such a hate-filled campus?

If you have been reading the Collegian during the past month, you probably have noticed the anti-gay columns preaching hatred. Now, I do not know the exact intentions of their columns, but here are my guesses:

■ To lower the self-worth of gays, lesbians and bisexuals as individuals (Well, thanks for contributing to the already rising statistic that gay and lesbian teenagers are three times more likely to commit suicide than their heterosexual peers).

■ To show deep concern that gays and lesbians will go to hell (I'll be the first to say thank you for your thoughtfulness, but gays and lesbians have worked it out with their higher power, much like you worked out last Thursday night with yours).

■ "I don't know any gays or lesbians, so why not trash them?" (Statistics state that at least one in 10 individuals are gay or lesbian. Next time you are in lecture, look around and do the math. Chances are the other nine people have a friend or family member that falls into this category as well).

Hateful speech has an enormous trickle-down effect. First the gays and lesbians, then the Jews and Muslims, then the Blacks and Hispanics. When will it stop? When we have killed each other to prove survival of the fittest? In reality, heterosexual men should rejoice gay men and heterosexual women, the same of lesbians — it comes down to less competition in looking for a mate.

To quote a third grader from Wisconsin who was discussing sexual orientation in class, "So what's the big whoop?"

My point exactly. What have gays and lesbians done to you personally to elicit such negative feelings against them? The university setting provides us with tons of resources to educate ourselves on topics with which we are unfamiliar.

Education is power. Ignorance just reinforces stereotypes and leads to hate.

I challenge you to attend a meeting of a group with which you are unfamiliar and ask questions.

The Queer Straight Alliance provides educational panels and pamphlets about sexuality, in a non-threatening environment. Like our teachers always have said, "The only stupid question is the one never asked."

The Collegian has long been one of the best recruitment and media tools the university has ever had. If it continues to use hate as its focal point, we are going to lose students, faculty and staff members who do not want to live in a discriminatory environment. What happened to "Love thy neighbor?"

A person's sexual orientation is a small part of the whole. You either can love the whole person or nothing at all.

I am not afraid of that which judges me in the end. It is those who judge me now that I am afraid of.

Karrie Mitchell is a graduate student in college student personnel and president of the Queer Straight Alliance. You can e-mail her at kmitch@ksu.edu.

Essay exams utilize needed skills left unused by Scantron testing

I was walking out from taking an exam recently and instead of the usual relief, I was overcome with a distinct sadness. I realized I had answered two questions incorrectly and would lose a large portion of points because of it.

As I thought about how I possibly could have made this error, it reminded me there was a greater tragedy involved. These questions formed the foundation of the information the course was intended to cover, and they were presented in a most insulting fashion. I simply was asked to list the components of a certain concept.

The question distinctly asked for a list with no explanation. I was not even given the chance to justify my answer or explain my greater understanding. I only was to list.

I had class directly after the exam, but the entire time I was wondering why I take so many courses at K-State that ask similar questions and in the end, the only real-world concern is the grade received.

Classes like this often have all their exams graded by computer, and more often than not, the instructors lecture from slide shows prepared by the textbook publishers.

Sometimes, their exam questions are taken from the textbook publisher's example exams. While I agree in some courses, such as ones in which multiple choice questions do test information synthesis, this rarely is the case.

With a large portion of courses being run in this fashion, I began to question the value of my education. I'm embarrassed to say to my parents I rarely learn much in the classroom. These classes encourage note memorization, not information synthesis and comprehension. I've only been fortunate enough to have a handful of classes where I was blessed with essay and short-answer exams in which I truly could be given a chance to prove why my interpretation of the information is the most useful.

Should this not be the point of taking these courses? Any student should be able to explain the concepts of a course and how they fit together instead of listing and memorizing orders. These lists and orders should come naturally when the information is synthesized, but the courses are not encouraging this type of learning. They only care about the result, whether the list is correct or in the correct order. The ability to comprehend and explain these subject areas should be what students are tested upon.

However, grades do not necessarily reflect this. They test your ability to memorize, which should be an educational crime at this point in your education. These skills need to be developed long before a university education.

This drama turns tragic when you consider employers are basing their hiring decisions on these grades. I'd like to be able to say my grade point average reflects my effort and ability to learn the information and retain it for later use, not my ability to recall obscure dates and battles.

I do not blame employers — they need to use all the instruments available to make the right hiring decisions. I believe the brunt of the responsibility lies with the instructors.

The effort to test students' true understanding of a subject must be taken. I am fed up with Scantrons and No. 2 pencils. Maybe they would be tolerable if they were designed to force using the knowledge to derive an answer, but the answer almost always is right out of the book.

I won't even begin to guess why the system is the way it is. I only plead to instructors to educate us in such a way that at the course's completion, I know I have learned information that will not fade from my short-term memory soon after the test.

The real kicker is tuition was raised again. I have faith that K-State faculty can provide the education the Kansas Board of Regents thinks they can charge us for. I just hope it happens before employers realize how much a college degree has been devalued.

Yeah, Collegian, can you make sure we don't have any naked presidential candidates in the library this year? Thanks.

Delta Upsilon calendar contest to raise money for needy families

By BROOKE ERICKSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Delta Upsilon Calendar Contest is here again. Those hoping to get into the calendar can meet at 6 p.m. Thursday at Joe's Tap Room for the last informational meeting before the competition.

The preliminary part of the contest will take place at Silverado Saloon on March 2, 9 and 16, with finals March 30.

The men of Delta Upsilon fraternity have been doing this philanthropy for 17 years, raising money for the Village of Topeka, a home for broken families.

During Christmas, the fraternity travels to Topeka to give the kids of the homes presents and in the spring the men play games with them. The money is raised by the sale of the calendars and half of the cover charged for admission to Silverado on these dates.

Each night there will be eight judges.

The judges consist of football players, sponsors, DU alumni and ROTC," said Todd Kavouras, philanthropy chair and junior in sociology.

The women are judged in three categories — formal, casual and swimwear. Not only are they judged on their stage presence, but also on their answers to a variety of questions.

There will be four winners each night and those winners will be asked back for finals.

Each of the 12 winners will receive prize packages from Sea-Doo. The first place winner receives $750 plus her photo on the cover of the calendar, second place receives $400 and third place receives $250.

The contestants pick four or five songs to which they come out on the stage. Bradley J., DJ for KJCK-FM 94.5 and master of ceremonies for the contest, is offering help in selecting the music.

"I want to make it classy and comfortable for the ladies," he said.

J.J. Zogelman, philanthropy chair and senior in agricultural technology management, said he thinks the event is a great way to raise money. Annie Rose, sophomore in dance and elementary education, was a winner in last year's competition and will help the contestants decide what to wear.

"You have to wear whatever makes you feel comfortable," she said.

Tracy McCrory, junior in English, said she is looking forward to the competition.

"I think it will be a lot of fun," she said. "Plus, it's a great way to maybe make some fast cash."

Kim Klenner, junior in marketing, said she thinks the contest is for a good cause.

"Not only is the contest for a good cause, it will be a lot of fun showing all of our personalities on stage and just having fun," she said.

She also said the best and worst part of the contest is going to be walking on stage the first time.

"The first time I walk out on stage is going to be an anticipated time, but once I get comfortable, the worst and best part are going to be all at once," Klenner said.

Housing and Dining Services honors residence hall assistants this week

By STEPHANIE J. BONNELL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Anyone who ever has lived in the residence halls knows there are many people there to assist students.

These people are the resident assistants, multicultural assistants, academic resource assistants and community assistants.

RAs and MAs often are awakened in the middle of the night to handle emergencies, to uphold policies and to serve as resources for between 20 to 75 residents on their respective floors, said Shana Meyer, coordinator for academic affairs for The Department of Housing and Dining Services.

The Housing and Dining Services' Recognition Team is recognizing these students to show their appreciation for the things they do every day. ARA and CA assistants were recognized last week, and this week RAs and MAs are being recognized.

The different activities being provided for these students are door decorations, certificates, banners, small gifts, public recognition and a surprise event.

"We hope students, staff, and faculty members across campus take the opportunity to recognize RAs and MAs for their hard work and dedication in the residence halls," Meyer said. "These people are students that are working to help residents adjust to college and keep things running smoothly. Academic Resource Assistants are students who work the reception desk at the Derby Academic Resource Center.

The ARAs also assist the coordinator of Academic Affairs, the assistant coordinator of Academic Affairs and the coordinator of marketing for Housing and Dining Services with academic projects.

Community assistants are desk receptionists in each of the residence halls. The CA answers the phone, sorts mail and helps students and visitors find their way around the halls.

"It was a lot of fun to interact with all students and get to know a lot of different people," Charla Wells, junior in mass communications, said.

Wells was a CA in Ford Hall last year. She now is the multicultural assistant for West Hall.

Multicultural assistants run programs in their hall to deal with diversity in religion, sexual orientation and race.

In observance of Black History Month, Deah Robinson, sophomore in public relations, is doing a program called "Say What" for Goodnow Hall residents.

"I want this to help diminish stereotypes of different races," Robinson said.

Robinson is going to survey random people in the hall on stereotypes of other races. Then a panel of students will talk about the stereotypes from the surveys.

Latoya Jones, junior in apparel and textile marketing, was diversity chair for the Hall Governing Board her freshman year. Her sophomore year, Jones was a CA, and now is an MA.

"My favorite thing is being able to help students adjust to the campus," she said.

Meyer said resident assistants run programs, build a sense of community, serve as resources and uphold policies in the residence halls.

Jeff Olin, sophomore in secondary education, is the RA for the third floor of Haymaker Hall.

"I want to be a teacher and a football coach," he said. "Being an RA helps me be a leader and build community among residents, and to watch people develop."

Meyer said she hopes others will become involved in the Appreciation Weeks by giving a staff member a card, sharing a word of thanks or simply providing a smile.

Cats to attempt to end losing streak with game against Texas A&M

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State men's basketball program will try to end its 11-game losing streak when it faces the Texas A&M Aggies at 7 tonight in Bramlage Coliseum.

For K-State, a game against another struggling Big 12 Conference foe could not come at a better time. Additionally, the Cats already have experienced the nation's sixth-hardest schedule — including three of the past five games against ranked opponents.

Assistant coach Mark Fox said the Cats are ready to get back on the court.

"We're excited about having another chance to play and get something done here," Fox said. "We just need to continue to play solid at both ends of the floor, like last week."

Despite being on the losing side last Saturday against Missouri, K-State did play well. Actually, it might have been the Cats' best performance during the skid.

It is not too often a team trails by 11 at the half after shooting nearly 60 percent from the field. Unfortunately for K-State, 12 of the Tigers' 14 first-half field goals were three-pointers.

On the heels of the suspension of junior point guard Galen Morrison, K-State will look for more of the same production it received against the Tigers from freshman guard Kenyatta Dix.

After his playing time was limited much of the season because of depth at the position, Dix took full advantage of the opportunity and led the Cats with 22 points.

"What he did doesn't surprise us," Fox said of Dix. "He finally got his chance to sustain minutes. He gave us a game that we feel he can better and match down the road.

He had a real nice day."

The Aggies are led by freshman guard Bernard King, who is averaging 16.6 points a game.

Fox said King, though still young, has the making of a great player in this league.

"King is a great player and a very potent scorer," Fox said. "We have to guard him and keep him from getting open looks like Missouri did Saturday."

On the opposite end of the spectrum has been the lackluster play from senior forward-guard Josh Reid. Reid has struggled from the field since coming back from a broken right foot that sidelined him for much of the season.

Reid, who made his return Feb. 2, has averaged just 2.2 points a game and has made only 19 percent of his field-goal tries.

"To be honest, Josh is just not healthy," Fox said. "He was on the verge of having a great senior season, but he can't be blamed for this. It just happens sometimes."

"He had to come back a little earlier than he would have liked, or he was going to miss his entire season. Josh is a fighter, and he'll get through this."

REBOUND blunders

STORY BY MICHAEL NOLL

Women's basketball team struggles defensively in loss against No. 1 Oklahoma

When the K-State women's basketball team struggled, so did the Sooners, and when the Cats finally found their offensive rhythm, the Sooners followed suit in their 64-56 victory over K-State.

Neither team made devastating runs. The Sooners (21-6, 11-3) were just a little better than K-State (12-15, 2-9) all night.

As a result, K-State head coach Deb Patterson said she was not unhappy with her team's performance despite the loss.

"I was really proud of our overall game tonight against the No. 1 team in the league," Patterson said.

While K-State ended the game with 56 points, it apparently had sealed the basket shut for the first half, as the Cats could only muster 15 points. Oklahoma countered with 22 points.

Forward Nicky Ramage, who scored just two points in first half, said the Cats struggled to adjust to Oklahoma's defense.

"I just think it took me too long to get settled in," Ramage said. "I was totally going out of my game to suit their defense."

In the second half, K-State started hitting baskets. Guards Kristin Rethman and Kim Woodlee each hit four three-pointers, and Ramage scored 10 points to end with 12 for the game. Rethman scored 16, and Woodlee tallied 15 points. As a team, the Cats shot 50 percent in the half.

No matter how close K-State came, however, the Sooners would hit consecutive momentum-changing shots to increase their lead again.

The Cats inability to regain the lead in the second half was the game's defining factor, Patterson said.

"We didn't do the little things that would allow us to tie or be in a position to win the

Whaley dominates OU's offense

By DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Phylesha Whaley proved to be the thorn in K-State's side Tuesday night at Bramlage Coliseum.

The senior forward led Oklahoma with a game-high 28 points, tying Kent State's Dawn Zerman for the most points scored against the Wildcats by an individual player this season.

"What makes Phylesha Whaley such a great player is her ability to be versatile and cause miss-match problems if you're playing man (defense)," K-State head coach Deb Patterson said.

And create matchup problems is what Whaley did.

The 5-foot-10-inch forward was pitted against K-State senior Nicky Ramage for most of the game, a kind of matchup Patterson said the Cat forward hasn't been accustomed to this year, due to Whaley's prowess as both an inside and outside scoring threat.

"It makes it very challenging for a four-player to mentally make that adjustment," Patterson said. "And we didn't make it, and it unfortunately cost us dearly. But I really give (Whaley) a good bit of credit for that."

Whaley obliterated any chance of a K-State comeback after drilling four three-pointers in the second half, all coming at critical points in the game.

"When we needed a basket, Phylesha got us a basket," Oklahoma head coach Sherri Coale said.

With the Cats within two points with 13:03 to play, Whaley scored the next five, including a three-pointer, to lead Oklahoma on a 7-0 run.

"That's why Whaley is the player she is in this league," Patterson said. "She doesn't only produce like this against Kansas State, she does it against Texas Tech, and Texas, and KU. She's just a wise, talented and versatile player."

Then Whaley hit three more treys from the 10:56 mark to the 6:04 juncture in the second half, to extinguish the Cat rally.

"In the second half, I gave her some threes that shouldn't have been given," Ramage said. "When a girl like that is hot, especially in the second half when she came on, you need to realize that you can't leave her."

Baseball's comeback could mark start of exciting World Series play

Baseball is back.

It has been a long road back for America's pastime, but the new millennium will belong to baseball.

The sport took its beatings in the early '90s, and the strike turned many fans away from the game.

Attendance dropped, and baseball was overshadowed by "da Bulls" and prime-time football. Thank God for old blue eyes. No, I'm not talking about Frank Sinatra, but the most durable man not named Bob Barker — Cal Ripken Jr.

Ripken resurrected America's love of the game and resurrected baseball when he broke Lou Gehrig's consecutive-game streak. All baseball fans can remember where they were when they watched Ripken run around Camden Yards. For the first time in years, baseball received good publicity — and a lot of it.

However, it was not until two giants chased the most prestigious record in sports that baseball retook its rightful place in Americans' hearts. Home-run kings Mark McGwire and Sammy Sosa launched baseball into new heights.

Now, the fans are back and the game is as popular as ever, so it's time to see what to expect in the year to come.

Last year ended on a flat note, with the New York Yankees sweeping the Atlanta Braves in the World Series. It would have been more exciting to see an ultimate fighting bout between the teams' obnoxious owners, George Steinbrenner and Ted Turner. However, the playoff chase leading to the fall classic was the most exciting in years, and this year will be every bit as interesting.

The National League will be the most exciting league to follow. Nine teams have a shot at the playoffs, and there might be a few that even could challenge the Braves, but I'm not getting my hopes up. The league now possesses the three premier home-run hitters in the game, as Ken Griffey Jr. joins McGwire and Sosa in the newly crowned home-run derby league.

The team with the best chance at the Braves is the Houston Astros. With a great lineup and a solid pitching staff, this team is a legitimate contender.

The other main contenders for the National League pennant are the New York Mets, the St. Louis Cardinals and the Cincinnati Reds. The Mets have a solid team, and their run at the World Series last year was one of the most dramatic ever. The Mets' downfall might be the age of their pitchers. The addition of Jesse Orosco has made the average age of Mets' pitchers older than

South Carolina Sen. Strom Thurmond.

The Reds and the Cardinals have potent offensive lineups, but both have question marks at pitching and both have to battle with each other and the Astros to make the playoffs.

The West doesn't matter much. Whichever team comes from the division will lose in the first round. The only hope for excitement is if Dodgers owner Rupert Murdoch, seeking to plug his FOX network, changes the Dodgers to the Los Angeles Simpsons.

The Braves will be better this year. Yes, I know that is a scary thought, but with Javy Lopez, Andres Galaraga and Kerry Ligtenberg back and a good leadoff man in Reggie Sanders, the Braves will be tougher than ever.

The American League will not be as exciting because there just are not as many good teams. The New York Yankees will be good again but will start to show signs of vulnerability. The Boston Red Sox rode Pedro Martinez as far as they could last year, and will attempt to do so again. The primary problem for the Red Sox is that the combined earned-run average of the rest of their starters is 6.21.

Cleveland will dominate the weak Central Division. Royals fans, take heart — the Royals will be one of the most exciting teams in baseball, and Manager Tony Muser will have the young team playing well. Who knows? If they can get some pitching, they could make .500 this year and maybe take the Central in 2001.

The American League West parallels the National League West: Whoever comes out will fade early come playoff time.

Here it is, my World Series prediction: Braves and Yankees again, but this time the Braves win.

Students should investigate spring break plans early

BY KRISTEN DYMACEK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Wes Kleffner's spring break didn't go exactly as he had planned.

Kleffner, senior in golf course management, arrived at his resort, located along the beach in Panama City, Fla., the registration line stretched the length of the parking lot.

After waiting in line, he found the resort had been overbooked, and instead of getting the room he had reserved, he was moved a couple of miles away from the beach to a much smaller motel.

"The rooms were really small, and we had to pay the same amount of money that we had paid for the room at the resort," Kleffner said. "We didn't have a choice. We were stuck there."

Kleffner said he had booked his spring break trip weeks before through a travel agency he had seen advertised in brochures and the newspaper.

He said even though the agency failed to provide him with what he had been expecting, he didn't worry about it too much.

"It wasn't worth ruining the whole trip," he said. "We just made the best of it."

To avoid similar spring break problems, Stacey Showalter, travel agent for Creative Travel Inc. on Anderson Avenue, said students need to plan ahead.

"Students need to start planning this summer for next year's spring break," Showalter said.

"Then, when they come back to school in the fall, they can take advantage of good rates and specials available before Thanksgiving."

She said many agencies offer special packages that are good if students book their trips before Thanksgiving. Each package is different, but includes items such as free drinks, meals or party schedules.

Part of the early planning also includes doing some research about the travel agency students are thinking about using, Showalter said.

"Students can check to see if the company is registered with the Better Business Bureau to see if it's reliable," she said.

Rebecca Gould, associate professor of hotel and restaurant management and dietetics, said students also can look at Web sites and compare agencies.

"They really need to investigate more than one source for good comparisons," Gould said.

Once an agency is selected, she said the travel package should be looked over thoroughly, including reading the fine print.

"Students need to understand what's offered for that one price,"

Gould said.

"Does the package include just air fare, or does it also include lodging, meals or ground transportation?"

Showalter said students should question a package extensively if it seems too good to be true.

"If you get a deal that's going to cost $300 for a Jamaican trip, you should really be cautious," she said. "You really get what you pay for."

Gould said travel agencies aren't the only things that need research.

"Students really need to do their homework. They need to know all there is to know about their destination," she said.

"They need to know where they are going and what they are doing once they get there. They also need to read information about safety for that area."

Once a trip is booked, Showalter said it is possible to change plans, but, depending on the company, there usually are penalties assessed. She said even though changes sometimes will have to be made, it still is to the student's advantage to book trips months in advance.

"It allows the student to save so much money and stress in the long run," Showalter said.

Even though Kleffner isn't using a travel agent this spring break, he said he still would use one again.

"If I book through an agent again, I would definitely look around and try to go through an agent that was recommended by somebody," he said.

Infectious ACTING

Ebony Theatre Company to present play concerning bisexuality, AIDS this week

By NATALIA FARMER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

The Ebony Theatre Company, a campus group that brings black K-State students together in acting and theater production, is presenting "Before it Hits Home" at 8 p.m. Thursday, Friday and Saturday in the Purple Masque Theatre, located in the East Stadium.

Written by Cheryl L. West, "Before it Hits Home" focuses on the controversial issues of bisexuality and AIDS throughout a black jazz musician's life. Set in modern times, it portrays the realistic effect of AIDS on the community and families.

Tiffany Lee, director, said it was a great script and the reason she chose the play was because she simply was moved by the story line.

"I love it. The play is about the world now. The way it's written grabs your attention," she said. "It's funny and light-hearted, but explores issues and lets you know what's going on out there. I read it three or four times and found something new and interesting in it each time."

Lee said she thought everyone, regardless of race or background, could relate to the play in some form.

"I really hope people walk away with an understanding that homosexuality is not a disease and anybody can catch AIDS," she said. "It doesn't mean you are a bad person. We need to be open and show more of a family unit."

Nathan Jackson, cast member, said he has enjoyed his first semester working with Ebony Theatre. He said he feels the play tackles the diversity of homosexuality, since it usually is portrayed as a white issue.

"This is a wake-up call," Jackson said. "It gets your attention and hits home straight away because it shows how much the disease affects everyone."

Aubrey Kershner, stage manager, said the cast has been rehearsing for about three hours each night, though only three of the actors are theater majors.

"It's been a positive thing in many ways, because so much effort has been put in," she said. "It's been a learning experience because we were all on different levels and a lot of patience was needed."

Ebony Theatre offers students the chance to expand all of their creative talents. Lee said she has worked with the group since her freshman year and enjoys acting as well as directing.

"The hardest thing for me is combining everything I do," she said. "As an actor, I have to live up to the great scripts, and as a director, I have to worry about the lighting and clothing."

had Wilson, 12, has makeup applied Monday evening before a dress rehearsal of "Before it Hits Home." Ticket prices are $3 for students/seniors and $5 for general public. They are available at the McCain Box Office from noon to 5 p.m. weekdays at 532-6428 or at the door.

Brown Bag Lunch features discussions on art

By JAINA K. STUTHEIT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Jonathan Holden, distinguished university professor in English and poet in residence at K-State, will read from some of his recent books at noon today at the Western Art Brown Bag Lunch in the auditorium of the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

The Brown Bag Lunch Series has been going on throughout the month of February. This will be the fourth and last Brown Bag Lunch of the series. People either can bring their own lunch, or buy lunch from the Arch Cafe in the museum. The event is free.

Kathrine Walker Schlageck, education and public services supervisor for the museum, said the series focuses on the John A. and Margaret Hill Collection of American Western Art.

This collection is a traveling exhibit organized by the Cheekwood Museum of Art in Nashville, Tenn. The exhibition features paintings, sculptures and drawings that are reminiscent of the Great West.

"The series has been designed to invite anyone to come examine some of the issues and ideas that the Hill Collection of Art brings to mind," Schlageck said.

Although the first two Brown Bag Lunches focused on visual art, Schlageck said literature has been integrated as well.

"Art and literature are natural partners," she said. "We are trying to incorporate all kinds of art into our events at the museum."

Schlageck said the previous lunches have brought in about 15-20 people, which is a good number of participants for a group discussion.

"It's not just someone lecturing, but people participating in a discussion," she said.

Holden said he is looking forward to participating in the event.

"I like to speak and read my poems, as all poets do," he said. Holden, who has just had his 17th book published, has been writing poetry since the '60s, when he was in college.

"I began studying poetry as literature," he said. "Then I realized that I would like to write poetry as well as read it."

Holden said he plans to read the introduction from his latest book, "Old Formalism: Character in Contemporary American Poetry."

Elizabeth Dodd, associate professor of English and director of the creative writing program, spoke at the third Brown Bag Lunch. She said she presented her article "Michael Harper, Clark's Way West and the problem of historical blindness." Her article was published in the Western American Literature Journal.

"There was a very small crowd, but people were interested and we actually had a conversation afterward," Dodd said.

Dodd said she is glad the museum is offering a wide variety of activities. "The museum is becoming a kind of hearth, or central home, for intellectual and creative thought," she said.

"It gives people a way to dip into something they might be interested in without enrolling in a class or reading a whole book."

Workshop about monotypes to feature local artist's pieces

By RAEGAN TONEY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Fun and creativity are in the plans for the monotype workshop at 7 p.m. Thursday night at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

"The workshop is based on the exhibition of Renee Stout, an African American artist who is now working in Washington, D.C., but was born in Junction City," said Kathrine Walker Schlageck, education and public service supervisor for the museum. "The idea is to look at her monotypes and then do your own."

A monotype basically is a print made from a flat surface, said Suzanne Hale, museum registrar and workshop instructor.

To make a monotype, paint or ink is applied to a plate. The plate can be metal, plexiglass or any flat surface. The paint or ink is applied to the plate and then paper is placed on top of the ink. The plate either is run through a press or the artist can apply pressure to the paper by using the back of his or her hand, or the back of a spoon.

"It's a very simple, simple process," Hale said. "The nice thing about monotypes is that you don't have to have a press. You can even do it at home."

Hale said participants in the workshop will be using plexiglass to make their own monotypes.

"We're going to take a look at Renee Stout's monotypes, look at the process and see what she's done with them," Hale said. "Then, each participant gets to make at least a few of their own monotypes."

Monotypes are different every time, Hale said, because the surface used is very smooth and the way the paint is applied changes the image. "Paint is transferred directly to paper making each print unique," Hale said.

Monotype has become a very popular medium throughout the country. Teresa Schmidt, associate professor of art, said.

Schmidt teaches monotype and woodcut relief classes in the fall, and said more people are doing monotype now than in the past.

"Basically, you're doing painting and drawing and then printing it," Schmidt said. "So, basically, you're using all three mediums."

Schmidt said due to the use of so many mediums in monotype, looking at Stout's work is a good experience for any art student.

"I think it's great that she's doing it," Schmidt said. "Although I'm not teaching the class this semester, I encourage all art students to go to it."

Hale said participants will enjoy the relaxed atmosphere.

"It's going to be pretty casual and primarily going to be a studio workshop," Hale said.

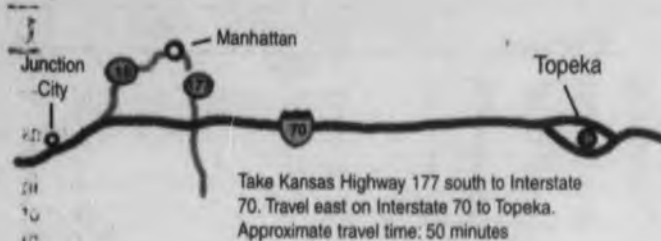

The event is open to the public, but Hale said she recommends calling making a reservation. There is space for 15 participants and they will be required to pay $3 to help cover supply costs.

The state seal is displayed on a monument outside the Kansas Statehouse. Several other statues and memorials can be found on the capitol grounds.

Capitol CITY

Topeka home to elaborate historical Kansas art

The Kansas Statehouse, 300 SW 10th St., Topeka, is home to Kansas lawmakers.

Constructed between 1866 and 1903, the capitol has a variety of architectural features that distinguish the building from other state capitols.

The outside of the dome is covered with copper sheeting. The glass panels that can be viewed from the inside of the building make up the inner dome. The outer dome extends 75 feet above the inner dome. There is no public access to the top.

The capitol's Senate chamber, one of the most elaborate in the country, has a blue marble base that was imported from Belgium.

The building also houses eight murals, including a picture featuring the explorations of Lewis and Clark in the Kansas area and one depicting the 1864 Battle of Mine Creek, the only large Civil War battle in Kansas.

Capitol tours are conducted at 9, 10 and 11 a.m. and 1, 2 and 3 p.m. Monday through Friday. Admission is free.

For more information, call (785) 296-3966.

— Information provided by "Enjoying History and Heritage at the Kansas State Capitol."

Inside the Kansas Statehouse, large murals depict the different stages of Kansas history. There are many other decorations that draw crowds to the building for tours.

STORIES BY SARAH BAHARI

Replica reminiscent of nostalgic Topeka store

A group of women sit together reminiscing about the days when a drugstore nearly identical to the one at Ward-Meade Park served the residents of Topeka.

The drugstore, a replica of The Potwin Drug Store that closed in the 1970s, is one of the several attractions at the historic Topeka park.

Ward-Meade Park, 124 NW Fillmore St., includes the drugstore, a general store with a gift shop, a church, livery stable, one-room schoolhouse, train depot, log cabin and the main attraction — a Victorian mansion.

Valerie Mize, manager and buyer for the general store, said the land belongs to the city of Topeka. It originally was owned by the Meade family, then the Wards. The city founded it as a historical marker in the 1970s and continued to bring in and renovate old buildings.

Anita Wolgast, the park's executive director, said the park tells Topeka's early history. The Meade family was one of the first to settle in Topeka.

"It really is a Topeka history," she said. "Everything here connects directly to Topeka. All the buildings have a story."

J.C. Schlenze, high school senior, works part time at the drugstore. He said he enjoys the upbeat atmosphere of his job.

"It's kind of neat that I can do something I see in the movies," he said. "There's always that one guy behind the counter who's pretty cool."

Schlenze said he has developed a good relationship with his customers.

"Neighborhood kids come in and try to stump me with different drinks," he said. "It's pretty fun."

Possibly the most alluring part of the park is the nostalgic effect it has on people, Schlenze said.

"There's a guy who comes in who had my job in the '50s," he said. "He comes in to check on me and make sure I'm keeping the bar clean and everything."

Many area schools visit the grounds to learn about Topeka's history and roots, Mize said. It's a great interactive tool for students to be able to see what they read about in history books, she said.

All ages can enjoy what the park has to offer, Wolgast said.

"We appeal to all ages," she said. "We're intergenerational. We have senior groups that come in, and we have lots of weddings here. We hit all age ranges."

J.C. Schlenze, Ward-Meade Park employee, rings up a customer on the modern-day cash register at the Potwin Drug Store. The exhibit is full of memorabilia from a former drug store in Topeka.

The Heritage House Historic Inn is a three-story bed and breakfast at 3535 SW Sixth St. in Topeka. Before the home was an inn, it housed patients of the Menninger Foundation.

World-renowned hospital once housed ill, now serves travelers as bed and breakfast

Traveling business people and honeymooners now grace the bedrooms and hallways of what was once a world-renowned hospital for the mentally ill.

The Heritage House Historic Inn, a bed-and-breakfast inn near downtown Topeka, was transformed into an inn and restaurant in the 1980s, manager Patrick Knaak said.

It originally was opened in 1925 by Will and Karl Menninger as the Menninger Foundation.

According to the inn's "History of the Heritage House," it was intended as a private sanitarium for mentally ill patients.

The hospital housed patients in the building for some time. The hospital became too well-known, and the house no longer was able to support the patients. Until 1982, the Menningers used the old house as office buildings. Then, in 1988, the Heritage House officially opened its doors to travelers.

Now, the bed and breakfast stands in a fairly busy part of the city at 3535 SW Sixth St., yet inside the house, visitors feel homey and comfortable, Knaak said.

There are 11 rooms inside the house, ranging in price from $62 to $139 a night. Each of the rooms was decorated by a different local designer, with designs ranging from formal to country casual.

Knaak said there are many benefits to staying in a bed and breakfast inn as opposed to a hotel.

"It's great for single women travelers," he said. "It offers a lot more security than hotels. We actually know our customers and see them coming in and out."

He said the peace and quiet also is beneficial to the business people who need time to concentrate on work.

Ninety percent of the weekday clientele is business people, Knaak said. Weekends bring much more leisure travel. The Menningers, whose facilities have been relocated to 5800 SW Sixth St., still provide business.

"We have a lot of people when there are seminars or when people are visiting family members and friends," Knaak said.

Knaak and his wife, Robyn, are running the business for a family friend. They started their new job on Valentine's Day 1999.

It was quite a change for the couple, originally from California, who had no previous hotel business experience. By trade, Knaak is a chef, and he continues to cook at the inn's restaurant.

Robyn said running a bed and breakfast has been a 24-hour job.

"Someone has to be there all the time for the guests in case something happens," she said.

The most challenging part about owning the bed and breakfast inn has been its upkeep, Patrick said.

"Just the maintenance of an 80-year-old house," he said. "The window leaks. The roof leaks. It's always something."

The inn's most rewarding attribute is that it gives visitors a chance to meet other travelers and talk to people from other areas, Robyn said.

"It's a home away from home," she said. "People can come downstairs and socialize. It's great for business travelers. It's great for everyone."

Weisenburger said the renovations started Jan. 1 and are expected to be completed before the fall semester.

"It's an old building with a lot going on, but McPherson Contractors have been on schedule," Weisenburger said. "They have found things like mercury that had to be dealt with. Also, there is a substantial amount of asbestos, but that was expected."

Weisenburger said the plans for the new studios were designed by the Ken Ebert Design Group, Architects and Planning Consultants Inc. of Manhattan.

The total renovations are estimated to cost in the range of $5 million, Weisenburger said, with the majority of money coming from Crumbling Classroom funding.

"A few years ago, the state of Kansas allotted bonds to the six major institutions represented by the Kansas Board of Regents for the purpose of renovating building to improve facilities," DeBusman said.

K-State originally received $32.4 million from the Kansas Legislature in 1996. Since then, the funds have been used to improve buildings and classrooms around campus.

The schedule for the renovations has been split into three phases, the first being the main renovation of the first and second floors of parts of the east wing.

The other phases will follow after the completion of the initial phase, depending on when the private funds can be raised. The second phase focuses on the changing the basement of Seaton East.

The final phase includes eliminating the structure that connects Seaton Hall with Seaton Court. Plans for what will fill the space still are being discussed.

While the building is under construction, the Department of Architecture has made arrangements for makeshift studios around the campus, Weisenburger said.

The bulk of these studios have been placed off campus in the 1st Bank Center on the corner of Claflin Road and Denison Avenue.

"It is a change to not have studio classes in Seaton," said Jeremy Swift, sophomore in architecture, planning and design. "Any inconvenience will be worth it, though, since everything is being remodeled and brought up-to-date."

"Manhattan continues to have labor shortage during the day," Griggs said. "This system will help provide better service during the day."

Westloop Dillons has eight check-out stands in addition to the four new U-Scan lanes.

Keith Zipprich, store systems supervisor, said four new lanes will be staffed by one Dillons employee who monitors all of the transactions through a computer window and a camera located in each unit.

"The employee sees the cameras that show each unit," Zipprich said. "The employee watches over the four units."

The units are equipped so that the customer does all of the scanning and procedures themselves, but still has features to ensure store safety.

"The bag rests on a scale that measures what you scan and what you put in the bag, which is good for two reasons," Griggs said. "One is for our security, and another is to keep the customer from being overcharged."

Customers can choose any method of payment they wish. The units accept cash, credit cards, debit cards or electronic benefit cards and scans coupons as well. Shoppers who wish to pay with checks or gift certificates complete those transactions through the cashier.

The possibility of jobs being in jeopardy is one issue that might be of concern, but Griggs said the system will not be taking the place of any of the employees.

"The problem of labor shortage is not as great in Manhattan except during the day," Griggs said. "We are not reducing any labor, but increasing service."

game," Patterson said. "And the great teams do the little things."

When Oklahoma was rebuilding leads, it was usually guard/forward Phylesha Whaley leading the way. During one second-half stretch, Whaley scored 12 of Oklahoma's 18 points. She finished the game with 28 points. K-State's inability to stop Whaley was due mostly to individual breakdowns, Ramage said.

"I gave her some threes she shouldn't have been given," Ramage said. "When a girl like that is hot, you need to realize that you can't go and help other people, and you can't leave her."

Except for Whaley, K-State did a good job defending the Sooners, who scored 16 points less than their season average. Normally high-scoring guard Stacey Dales was held to just four points on one-for-12 shooting. The K-State players were proud of this defensive performance, Woodlee said.

"The coaches really prepared us today and had us ready for a lot of the looks we saw," Woodlee said. "We had really good communication and did really good on defense aside from those rebounds they got offensively."

Offensive rebounds were a large contributor to the Cats' losing effort. Oklahoma grabbed 16 offensive boards, allowing them to get second-chance shots and keep the ball out of K-State's hands.

Sooners forward Caton Hill credited their rebounding ability for the win.

Whaley said she felt comfortable offensively against K-State.

"The shots were going in — that's always good," she said. "When everybody's on the same page, it makes it easier for me and everybody else."

Oklahoma guard LaNeisha Caufield said the team looked to get the ball to Whaley when the team needed a quick basket.

"Usually, whenever we have a teammate that's on, you try to set screens and move the ball around to get it to them," Caufield said.

Whaley also hurt the Wildcats on the boards, grabbing 12 rebounds, six of which coming on the offensive glass.

"She's very quick," Ramage said. "She's one of those players where you just can't stand there and block her out — you have to keep pushing her out or she'll go around you."

Nevertheless, Whaley was quick to deny any notion that Oklahoma was a one-player team.

"We have so many great players that they have to play every last one of us one-on-one," Whaley said. "I don't feel like I have to carry this team. We're all in this together."

Endeavour completes successful mapping

By MARCIA DUNN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — Space shuttle Endeavour and its crew of six returned to Earth on Tuesday with more than a week's worth of radar images that will be transformed into the finest maps of the planet.

Commander Kevin Kregel guided the shuttle down through a clear sky moments after sunset. Gusty winds at the runway had forced him to make an extra swing around Earth, delaying the homecoming by 1 1/2 hours.

"Kevin, congratulations to you and the crew on a highly successful mission of mapping the world," Mission Control radioed once Endeavour rolled to a stop.

During their 11-day voyage, Endeavour's astronauts worked in round-the-clock shifts to keep two large radar antennas running — one in the shuttle cargo bay and one on the end of a 197-foot mast. The method is expected to produce precise 3-D maps of Earth's peaks and valleys.

The radar mapped 43.5 million square miles of Earth's terrain at least twice, just 2.5 million square miles shy of NASA's original goal. The surveyed land stretched as far north as British Columbia and as far south as Cape Horn and represented three-quarters of the world's terrain.

A faulty thruster on the end of the radar mast forced the crew to use extra shuttle fuel to steady the mast, the longest rigid structure ever deployed in space. To save fuel, the astronauts had to cut short their mapping by 13 hours.

"I thought this mission was one of the most challenging, difficult missions we ever undertook," NASA Administrator Daniel Goldin said. "We deployed a 200-foot boom and held the tip to inches. The radar was a few thousand pounds. The technology was incredible."

NASA's first order of business involved unloading the more than 300 digital tapes containing all the radar data. After several weeks of making copies of everything, the tapes will be flown to the Jet Propulsion Laboratory in Pasadena, Calif.

Scientists will keep the originals in humidity- and temperature-controlled chambers.

"We're really going to baby these things, obviously, because they're our crown jewels," said Michael Kobrick, a Jet Propulsion Laboratory scientist in charge of the project.

NASA and its partner, the National Imagery and Mapping Agency, expect it will take one to two years to analyze all of the tapes. The astronauts collected nearly 12 terabytes of data, enough to fill 20,600 compact discs.

The Pentagon will use the information to improve the aim of missiles and provide better navigation for fighter pilots and ground troops.

The best maps will be reserved for the military. Everyone else — archaeologists, geologists, airline pilots, emergency relief groups — will have to settle for less precise charts. But even those will be better than current ones.

Kobrick already is dazzled by the samples beamed down from orbit. The discoveries resulting from the mission should rival those of the Hubble Space Telescope, he said.

Habitat for Humanity helps students earn credit

By CLIF PALMBERG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Building homes for families in need now can earn college credit for K-State students.

Leaders in the K-State chapter of Habitat for Humanity, in partnership with the departments of Architectural Engineering and Construction Science, have developed a class that helps students with the process of building homes.

"I worked with Habitat for a while, and they had a great energy level and enthusiasm," Mike Haffling, course instructor, said. "I had always thought that it would be great for those who work on the houses to get college credit."

The course, Habitat Management, focuses on managing construction sites and using project management software.

"I think the main area the class is going to help out with is planning and estimating costs," said Jon Anderson, president of the K-State

Habitat for Humanity chapter and senior in construction science and management. "We can figure out how much labor it takes to build a house in this amount of time."

"We get practice with estimating, working with computer programs that we'll be using after graduation and just general, all-around practice. We haven't learned everything yet," he said.

The class focuses around Prolog Manager, a project management software program donated by Meridian Project Systems. Meridian donated the software as part of the Meridian Outreach Program, designed to educate students about the software and construction management.

Habitat for Humanity International is a nonprofit organization that strives to eliminate poverty housing worldwide. Habitat makes it possible for those in need to have simple, decent, affordable housing they can afford through no-interest loans.

Kansas technical jobs remain unfilled

By TANNER EHMKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

About 100,000 jobs in Kansas remain unfilled, and there is more work than there are workers.

"It's difficult to recruit highly skilled technical people to small communities," said Loren Wilson, programs marketing specialist for Kansas Technology Enterprise Corporation, a state economic development agency.

With Kansas unemployment the lowest it has been in 30 years, students are leaving Kansas for jobs outside the state. Many of the jobs left behind in Kansas include highly skilled technical positions, including engineers, scientists and information technology professionals.

"We're trying to recruit Kansas graduates that no longer live here to come back," Wilson said.

Wilson is the team leader of Home Again, a program sponsored by KTEC, is designed to help Kansas companies recruit skilled, technical workers.

The program targets science and engineering graduates of the past 10 to 15 years.

Roger Aeschliman, deputy secretary of the Kansas Department of Human Resources, said it's the most dramatic labor shortage in the United States this century.

"This is the biggest issue facing the state of Kansas right now," Aeschliman said. "We're doing more things to help curb the problem than you can imagine."

The recent labor shortage is not limited to Kansas, Aeschliman said. Companies across the nation are experiencing the same problems of finding labor. The jobs needing filled expand across every segment of the economy, from entry-level positions to CEO positions.

"There are, inevitably, negative effects on Kansas," Aeschliman said. "The effects of this labor shortage are way beyond my imagination."

With the average income in Kansas being about $30,000, Aeschliman said that amounts to $3 billion in unrealized personal income in Kansas and $5 billion of unrealized business income.

"Together, that makes nearly $500 million dollars in taxes that Kansas doesn't see," Aeschliman said. "And that's just in state taxes. That doesn't include local taxes." The foregone revenue is not the only factor that hurts the economy, Aeschliman said. Contractors are able to raise their prices on bidders, and labor becomes more expensive. The service industry is getting hit the worst, he said, because it is at the low-end of the pay scale. People earning minimum wage now can find jobs that pay considerably more despite their lack of skill.

To remedy the labor shortage, officials say Kansas needs to keep the students who are educated in Kansas.

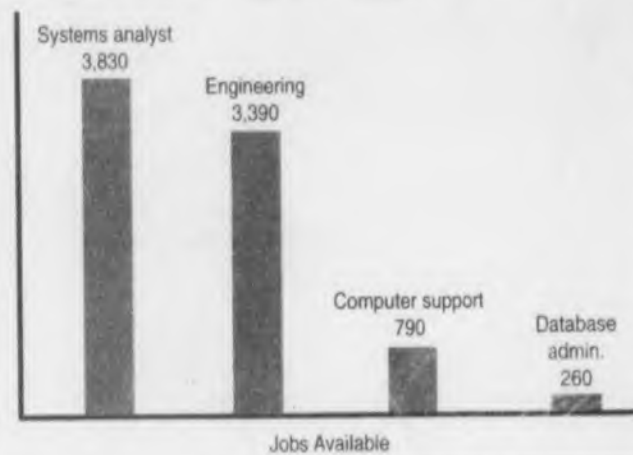

In the future, the Home Again program will expand to the Kansas universities. State agencies are discussing expansion to other industry fields and markets.

David Day, director of marketing for KTEC, said Kansas does a

SGA lobbies in Topeka for increased funding

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Bringing university issues to the attention of Kansas legislators was the purpose of two trips to Topeka this week for K-State students and staff members.

State Education Day brought representatives from Kansas Board of Regents schools, including K-State, the University of Kansas, Emporia State University, Wichita State University, Fort Hays State University, Pittsburg State University and area community colleges, to the Statehouse on Wednesday in order to educate policy makers about student concerns.

Travis Lenkner, Student Senate governmental relations chair, said the three issues K-State representatives brought to the table dealt with increased funding for financial aid, Hale Library and faculty salaries.

It is hoped requests for increased financial aid would make up for money not provided by Gov. Bill Graves' fiscal year 2000 budget, Lenkner said.

"We generally want to get new money to offset tuition increases," he said. "It would all be need-based aid, not merit-based."

A $1 per-credit-hour fee that will begin August for K-State students was created to provide library funding, Lenkner said. The amount collected by this fee was meant to be matched by the state.

"We have the same thing now with the technology fee, but the matching money for the library was also not part of the governor's budget," he said.

The final issue presented to legislators addressed not only funding for faculty salaries but also the coordination of the new regents' systems, Lenkner said.

He also said State Education Day allows legislators to put a Woman found guilty of vehicular homicide

By CRISTINA JANNEY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A 20-year-old Riley County woman was found guilty of vehicular homicide Wednesday in the July death of her 17-year-old friend.

Trisha Essary was found guilty after she entered a plea of no contest to the charge. Jessica Justice was killed when she was thrown from the car during an accident in which Essary was the driver.

Essary's lawyer Donn Everett said Essary's no contest plea was an attempt to put the incident behind her.

"She wants to accept responsibility and get on with her life," Everett said.

Assistant Riley County Attorney Bernard Irvine could not be reached for comment.

The accident happened when two cars were chasing each other down a gravel stretch of Pillsbury Crossing Road. Essary lost control of the car. It went up an embankment and the car rolled, throwing Justice from the car.

Justice died as a result of her injuries in the accident.

"She feels as though she lost a friend she treasured," Everett said of Essary.

Everett faces a maximum of one year in jail or both up to a $2,500 fine.

However, Everett said he thought Essary should be given probation.

9 inmates shot, 1 killed in California prison riot

By JEFF BARNARD
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CRESCENT CITY, Calif. — Guards shot nine inmates, killing one, to quell a race riot Wednesday at a prison that houses some of California's most dangerous criminals, a prison spokesman said.

About 200 black and Hispanic inmates with hand-made weapons began fighting in a yard of the highest-security wing of Pelican Bay State prison, Lt. Ben Grundy said. The violence ended a half-hour later after guards, who first used tear gas and pepper spray, opened fire, he said.

Grundy did not know what sparked the violence, although he said, "We've had racial incidents in the past."

The maximum-security prison was built for 2,280 inmates but has 3,400, many of whom were sent there after being involved in violence or escape attempts at other prisons.

About 1,200 of the inmates are in permanent lockdown conditions.

The eight prisoners wounded by guards were taken to hospitals, and one was in critical condition, said Grundy, who would not give details on the others' conditions.

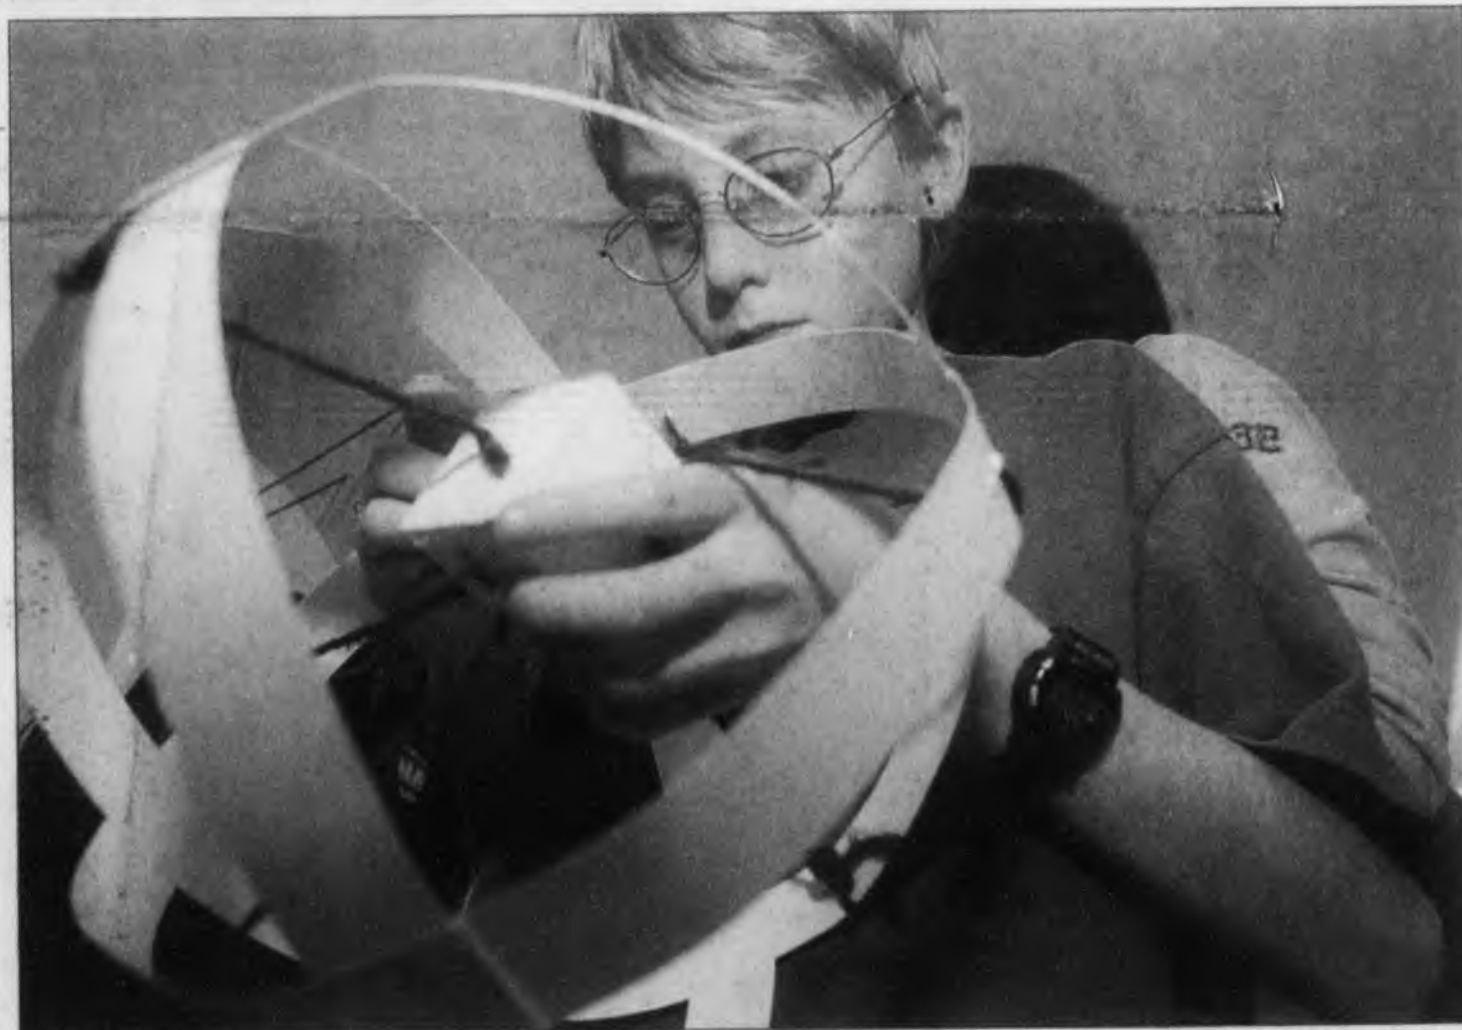

KIEM-TV reported that 19 inmates suffered injuries related to the melee, such as

ENGINEERING Eggsperts

Fourteen-year-old Eric VanNevel, Susan B. Anthony Middle School eighth grader, makes some final adjustments to his device, named Eggsactly. Eggsactly won most creative design.

Students learn engineering skills through egg contest

Anticipating a crushing landing from the third floor of the Durland Hall atrium, 117 Kansas middle and junior high school students cringed as each apparatus was released.

These students challenged themselves to use minimal resources to create safety devices on Wednesday for this year's egg drop, sponsored by K-State's chapter of the National Society of Professional Engineers.

The purpose of the annual event is to get students interested in engineering, said Eric Byer, senior in manufacturing systems engineering and NSPE president.

"It's never too late or too early to decide what you want your career to be. We want to get students interested in engineering today," Byer said.

Assistant Dean of Engineering Tom Roberts said this event is a great way to show prospective K-State students what classes and experiences they will need to incorporate into their education five to 10 years from now.

"Engineering requires a lot of math, science, English and speech classes," Roberts said to the students, "but being able to work in teams like you did today will be just as important for tomorrow."

Manhattan teams from Anthony and Eisenhower middle schools tied for first, weighing their safety devices in at 1.35 ounces. Team "eggcellent" from Anthony middle school said it had constructed a plan before the competition.

"We knew what they had to work with last year and what the competition was like," said Denise Gillmore, eighth grade student at Anthony Middle School. "The materials they gave us weren't the easiest to work with. I wish we could have had some super glue or tape."

Students were provided with a half sheet of poster board, yarn, paper clips and glue and were required to bring their own scissors.

Advisers of first-time participants from Pierson Junior High in Kansas City, Kan., said they have seen other egg-drop contests, but none that had materials like the ones used here. "I've seen similar competitions at Science Olympiad, and their materials were straws and Popsicle sticks," said Mona Tichenor, eighth grade teacher and sponsor of the science club at Pierson. "This competition seems very unique. I think the materials they were given are much more challenging than the ones I've seen used in the other competitions."

Second place went to the team from Wamego called "Gettin' eggy with it." Their device, shaped like a spool, weighed in at 1.5 ounces.

"Getting to try our ideas and see who's idea worked the best was the most challenging thing today," said Megan Dietrich, eighth grader at Wamego Middle School and "Gettin' eggy with it" team member. "We were hoping that our idea would work. Last year, one of our teams did something similar to our design, and they placed. We tried to make some changes to that design and hoped the materials were similar." Placing third from Wamego, the "Yolk slingers" weighed in at 1.65 ounces.

"We can't believe ours made it," said Frank Weeks, eighth grader at Wamego Middle School and member of the "Yolk slingers."

Graves' latest gun proposal fails to reach House debate

TOPEKA — Gov. Bill Graves' proposal to get the state out of the gun-selling business has been shot down by a House committee.

State law requires the Department of Revenue to sell seized weapons to federally licensed firearms dealers. Graves wanted to end that practice.

The House Federal and State Affairs Committee decided this week not to send Graves' measure to the chamber for debate.

"Most committee members thought that legislation was a bill in search of a problem," Chairman Tony Powell, R-Wichita, said Wednesday. "The problem isn't guns but what people do with guns."

Under Graves' plan, the department would have gotten a fair market value of the seized weapons and applied that to any taxes owed.

The Kansas State Historical Society would have gotten first crack at the weapon if it had any historical value. Next in line would have been local law enforcement officials who seized the weapon. If they didn't want the guns, the weapons would have been destroyed.

During fiscal year 1997, the revenue agency sold 20 handguns and 33 long guns; during fiscal 1998, it sold 54 handguns and 177 long guns. No weapons have been sold since July 1, 1998 by the department.

Committee approves court budget, discusses pensions

TOPEKA — The House Appropriations Committee ducked tough spending decisions Wednesday, approving Gov. Bill Graves' proposed budget for the courts and merely discussing pension issues.

Committee members said they don't agree with Graves' plan to freeze state contributions to the Kansas Public Employees Retirement System for teacher pensions. But they did not identify where to get $10.8 million the state would need for other programs, if Graves' bill to freeze rates fails.

"We do not agree with the governor's freeze on KPERS," said Rep. Jo Ann Pottorff, R-Wichita, chairwoman of the subcommittee studying the agency. "We think later there might be other moneys out there."

The committee plans to approve a KPERS budget next month.

It also will be finishing work on a plan to finance state government after July 1. The final version will be worked by House and Senate negotiators.

Members also went along with the governor's plan to provide $83.4 million for the judicial branch.

They agreed to revisit issues, such as adding judges in some areas, and introduced a bill that would repeal a law requiring one judge be assigned to each of the state's 105 counties.

"Let the court assign judges where the work is," Rep. Ed McKechnie, D-Pittsburg, said.

Those topics, and other difficult budget decisions, were pushed back until later this session.

Committee members said they hope more money will materialize by then.

It also is holding off to see whether a bill passes to increase court filing fees. That could provide revenue for projects such as increasing non-judicial pay.

Meanwhile, the Senate Ways and Means Committee approved funding for the Kansas Department of Transportation.

The committee voted to give the department about $1.3 billion, changing Graves' plan to remove money for employee salary raises. The committee plans to vote on salary increases for all state employees later.

Members also proposed cutting $1 million from KDOT's operating budget, saying needed money for technology projects can be taken from carry-over balances from a fund that provides money for employee bonuses, staff training and technology.

Committee members also discussed the 10-year comprehensive transportation improvement plan approved last year.

The department foresees a $50 million budget shortfall when projects are completed. The agency expects some of the projects to be finished after the 10-year program has expired.

"It's what we're going to need to pay contractors off," Transportation

Secretary Dean Carlson said. "There is no extra money."

Last breakfast. The last day for Jardine Terrace apartment residents to enjoy the breakfast club between 8 and 10 a.m. at the Thomas J. Frith Community Center is Friday.

This continental breakfast includes bagels, muffins, juices and other breakfast foods in a friendly environment.

"It's a social gathering for everyone," said Sarah Botkin, assistant coordinator for programs at Jardine. "It's a time for people to come in, relax and chat with other residents."

Botkin said residents with diversified backgrounds can come together to enjoy each others' company during the breakfast club. Professors, students, grandparents, parents and children take advantage of the breakfast that is offered Friday mornings for one month each semester.

Jardine's 550 apartments are 98 percent full and the breakfast club is just one of the many programs the management offers as something special for their residents.

Botkin said they try to rotate programs in order to offer all the residents something they can enjoy.

Teacher pay. A preliminary step toward creating merit pay for teachers was taken Wednesday by the Senate Education Committee.

The committee endorsed a bill to establish a new pay system for teachers, who could choose to earn more money but give up a degree of job security.

Education Chairwoman Barbara Lawrence, R-Wichita, said she thinks the Senate will pass the bill, but she isn't sure about its chances in the House.

The decision to participate in the pay plan would be up to each of the 304 school districts. If approved by the school district, each teacher then would decide which pay plan to use.

Under the proposal, the state education commissioner would create broad guidelines for new teacher salary plans, then school districts would develop their own plans based on the guidelines.

Those guidelines would include evaluating job performance of teachers and encouraging them to be creative and innovative. In addition, the guidelines would measure the impact of the pay plan on student learning and on teacher morale.

Elections open to Salina

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Interstate 70 is seeing more traffic as candidates for student body president and vice president make their way to K-State-Salina to try to get its students' votes.

Last spring, Student Senate passed a bill to give back to K-State-Salina students the right to vote for the university student body president and vice president. In 1997, the election regulations were rewritten, and K-State-Salina was left out when a constitutional amendment included the words "main campus" for those who are allowed to vote.

The College of Technology and Aviation never saw the amendment with the added words "main campus" because only six of nine college councils have to ratify the amendment, which does not include the College of Technology and Aviation.

K-State-Salina still has its own student body president and vice president, who are voted on during the same elections, to deal with issues and fees that only affect that campus. However, K-State-Salina still is affected by many of the issues that affect the main campus.

K-State-Salina student body president Jon Watkins said he is concerned with anything that is K-State policy or regulation that K-State-Salina falls under.

K-State-Salina student body vice president Kevin Giefer said he agreed.

"It's important that we have representation," he said. "Stuff that happens up there that we know that's going to affect us down here, we want to be able to have that vote."

Giefer said candidates are doing a good job of including K-State-Salina. On Tuesday night, a couple of candidates came and talked at a residence hall meeting, he said.

It's hard to tell what role K-State-Salina will play in the elections, but both Watkins and Giefer said it should be a factor with online voting.

"There's really not a class that any of our students have that they don't sit at a computer at some time during the day," Giefer said.

Robin Cates, campaign manager for presidential candidate Jesse McCurry and vice presidential candidate Kylo Heller, said she would like to see K-State-Salina play a bigger role in the elections.

"K-State-Salina is part of our university, and they should be recognized as such, as far as I'm concerned," she said. "Whatever we can do for them, we should."

Cates said it is important for candidates to go to K-State-Salina and find out what issues the students there want to see addressed.

Presidential candidate Jared Teach said he and his vice presidential candidate Stan Burkin definitely are going to target the Salina campus and see what issues are important to its students.

"We're pretty much going to start a campaign over there," he said. "K-State-Salina definitely plays a huge role in the elections."

Teach said he and Burkin plan on making a trip to Salina to visit with students in the next few days.

"They're going to vote for who they hear about and who makes an effort to come visit them," he said.

Some campaigns are going to use e-mail to reach students they know on the K-State-Salina campus.

Regina Timm, campaign manager for presidential candidate Andrew Maenche and vice presidential candidate Ali Karimi, said they don't have definite plans yet for targeting Salina students, but they probably would e-mail people they knew at the Salina campus.

Timm said she thinks K-State-Salina needs to play a bigger role in elections.

"I think people in the past should have paid more attention to them because it is considered part of us," she said.

Presidential candidate Jake Worcester and vice presidential candidate Dana Pracht also are going to use e-mail to reach Salina students along with making personal visits to the campus.

Travis Lenkner, campaign manager for Worcester and Pracht, said online voting is good for the K-State-Salina campus.

"Candidates should have to go to Salina to win because you represent them," he said. "It could make or break you."

Gunter, Kelso base platform on fulfilling students' wants

By JAMIE BARRETT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Making K-State students happy is what is important to presidential candidates Justin Gunter and Matt Kelso.

Gunter, junior in mechanical engineering, and Kelso, junior in architectural engineering, announced their candidacy for student body president and vice president Wednesday evening at Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon in Aggieville. Their campaign is titled "We Care About Your Ass."

Gunter said the campaign's main focus is going to be doing what the students want.

"We want the students to realize we care about them and want to get done for them what they want," he said.

The pair's platform focuses on improvements they believe need to be made in order to serve the students better. One of the issues Gunter and Kelso are focusing on is fixing the toilet paper problem they say is abundant on campus.

"We need softer toilet paper," Gunter said. "Every bathroom on this campus has hard, sandy toilet paper."

Another issue Gunter and Kelso are focusing on is installing push and pull signs on the front doors of Cardwell Hall.

KELLY GLASSCOCK/COLLEGIAN

"I can stand in front of those doors forever, and just when I decide to push, I realize I should have pulled," Gunter said.

Kelso said the reason they are focusing on these issues is because they know they can get them done.

"So many people say they are going to get things done and then they never do," he said. "We know that we can get these things accomplished."

Gunter and Kelso said that if they are elected, they also will poll students to find out exactly what is important to them.

"An electronic poll on the KATS system is one thing that we want so that we can get student feedback," Gunter said.

In addition to their platform, Gunter and Kelso are campaigning with a proposal that they say lightens things up in the classroom on a test day.

"We started thermoball in thermodynamics class last year, and it is just when someone brings a beach ball and the class bats it around the room," Gunter said.

Kelso said the proposal of thermoball would not be a policy but a recommendation.

"We would recommend it everywhere," he said. "On test days or anytime."

The main thing Gunter and Kelso are focusing on is making the students happy and finding out what will make them happier on campus.

Web sites provide opportunities to donate to charitable organizations

By JAMIE BARRETT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Helping save a rainforest or feeding a hungry person has become as easy as clicking a link on a Web site.

A trend has developed among certain Web sites that are offering to donate money to a charitable cause through paid sponsorship.

Care2.com, a nature-conscious Web site, is one of the sites sponsoring a cause.

The Web site started a Race for the Rainforest, a program that donates a certain amount of sponsor-paid money to saving a rainforest with every click on the link.

Melinda Su, director of marketing promotions with Care2.com, said the race started Jan. 14, 100 days before Earth Day.

"The race is called the 100-day race," Su said. "We have been very successful so far, and it has attracted about 20- to 25-thousand people a day so far."

Su said the site had two main sponsors that donate money with each click.

"Shoppinglist.com and Ethical Shopper have been our main sponsors," Su said. "But there are several others as well."

Care2.com donates 100 percent of its revenues to Adopt-an-Acre, a program associated with nature conservancy.

"It takes about $35 to purchase one acre of rainforest," Su said.

Su said Care2.com might decide to keep the program going due to the success but might also take on another type of race, such as one for endangered species.

"It has proven to be incredibly successful," Su said. "So it may continue after Earth Day, but we may take on a race for an endangered species, such as the panda."

Another site that is doing a similar program is the Hungersite.com. The donations from this site go to people instead of rainforests.

GreaterGood.com, a cause-focused e-commerce company, joined forces with the Hungersite.com to fight world hunger.

With a program similar to that of Care2.com, Hungersite.com has set up a link on its site that will donate one cup of food to a hungry person.

Allison Smith, of the APCO Associates, said the site has donated more than 9 million pounds of food to hungry people.

The site, started in June 1999, donates food to people in developing countries and has a goal to triple its amount of food donated this year.

Hungersite.com and GreaterGood.com are similar to Care2.com because they are some of the first companies to develop along with this trend.

"I believe that Care2.com is the first company to work with the Nature Conservancy in a program like this," Su said.

Although many people have not visited such sites, people are beginning to realize the good that can come from a single click of a mouse.

"I think that something like this is a easy and fast way to donate to a very good cause," Rachel Buffington, freshman in biology, said.

Students should take action against Carmike, Pepsi

K-State students enjoy being taken advantage of.

They get a thrill from getting walked on, pushed around, kicked in the face and cheated.

They find pleasure in pain.

They are gluttons for financial torture.

There really is no other way to explain how quiet and accepting students have been as businesses have come into town and proceeded to milk students for every cent they can find an excuse to demand.

Carmike Cinemas, since acquiring all of the movie theaters in Manhattan, steadily has hiked the prices of movies. Night shows now run $6.75. Matinee showings were boosted to $5 only a few days ago.

Pepsi Cola, after acquiring exclusive rights to vend soda on campus, has found sneaky ways to increase prices. First, they brought in bottle machines to replace can machines, making the 55-cent soda a thing of the past.

Now, they have announced they will be raising the price of fountain drinks in the K-State Student Union.

So, K-State students have gathered together en masse to protest the shafting to which they have been subjected. They stopped going to Carmike Cinemas. They bought their drinks at grocery stores and brought them to campus.

Not at all.

K-State students have stood by idly, watching as they take one kick to the pocketbook after another.

Sure, there have been complaints. There are calls to the Campus Fourum. There are mutterings at the soda machines. There are groans at the realization you'll have to stop at the ATM on the way to the theater.

But who hears these complaints? Other students. They're upset, too, but they equally are incapable of changing the situation.

It might seem petty to whine about such minimal increases in price. But a dime a day at the Union or an extra 50 cents or dollar per week at the theater will start to add up. Some students, already struggling financially, are becoming even more beleaguered by these incessant price hikes.

These students can do something about it, too. Sure, they might not be able to change the situation themselves, but a few angry callers and decreased sales can have a profound effect on a business' actions.

Students need to make some phone calls. They need to get angry. They need to say, "I will not go to your theaters again until prices are brought back down," or "Decrease the soda prices or I'm drinking Coke."

No idle threats. No vicious threats. They've hit us where it hurts, so hit 'em in the same place — the pocketbook.

Jake Wassenberg is the area representative for Pepsi. Call him at 539-5308. Tell him you're mad, and tell him why. Make him hear you, and tell him how much you've enjoyed the Coke advertisements of late.

Then call Fred Van Noy, senior vice president at Carmike Cinemas. Tell him you're mad, and tell him why. Make him hear you. Then mention how much you like the old Hitchcock films — you know, the ones that cost 49 cents at Video Express.

Students have a right to get upset. They are being nicked and dined to death by corporations trying to suck every cent from the paws of vulnerable college students. And they have an easy time, too, because those students never take time to complain.

Make time. Call in. Threaten to quit giving them your money.

And mean it.

understanding comes from clear light of Bible's teachings

Scott Roney. No other name at K-State has caused as much commotion. Well, maybe Tom Asbury or Jeff Elliott.

I digress. The name of this individual stirs and incites debate in classrooms, letters to the editor, calls to the Campus Fourum and meetings of Queer Straight Alliance and Christian groups across campus.

Roney's message is clear: he is a Christian defending what he believes.

The statements he makes appear to be absolute truth. He says they are based in the Bible. Absolute statements make people uncomfortable. They see these statements as judgmental, short sighted, ill-based and ignorant.

Is Roney right? Does the Bible contain absolute truth?

These questions best can be answered by looking through a cultural lens at trends that have dominated the actions and thoughts of men and women. By understanding our past, we are better equipped to make judgments about absolute truths.

In the Pre-modern era, before the 1700s, societies and cultures believed in objective truth. They believed this truth was maintained by a spiritual reality. The frame of reference during this period was that man existed because God existed.

With the 1700s came the Modern era, most of us are familiar with the name the Enlightenment period. The word enlightenment gives great definition to this era. It means to give the light of fact and knowledge, to reveal truths, to endow with discernment, to free from ignorance, prejudice or superstition.

During this period, a great confidence in human ability arose. The belief that humans, apart from God, could solve their own problems was predominant thinking. Great trust was put into the scientific method.

Today, we live in the Post-modern era.

Society and culture believes that real knowledge is fleeting and never can be obtained. They believe absolute truth is beyond man. Skepticism rules our thought processes and beliefs. The statement, "You can have what you believe, but don't force it on me," is a common ethos in our age. We are a culture unwilling to believe that there can be absolute truth.

It is through this cultural perspective that we read Roney's articles. Knowing our culture, and that a statement of absolute truth will fall on skeptical ears, in order for Roney's statements to be true, something must be different about the Bible in which he makes his claims.

Even for skeptics, there is something different. For those who believe in the Bible, they know the Bible transcends cultures. They know the Bible is inherent, and absolute truth can be drawn from its pages.

It is the only book we have that is completely without error, even though 40 different people contributed to it over a period of 1,500 years.

This seemingly impossible fact is because the Bible is God-breathed. The authors were guided by the inspiration of God.

It is for this reason that in our culture, where we view statements of absolutes as ignorant, that there can be truth.

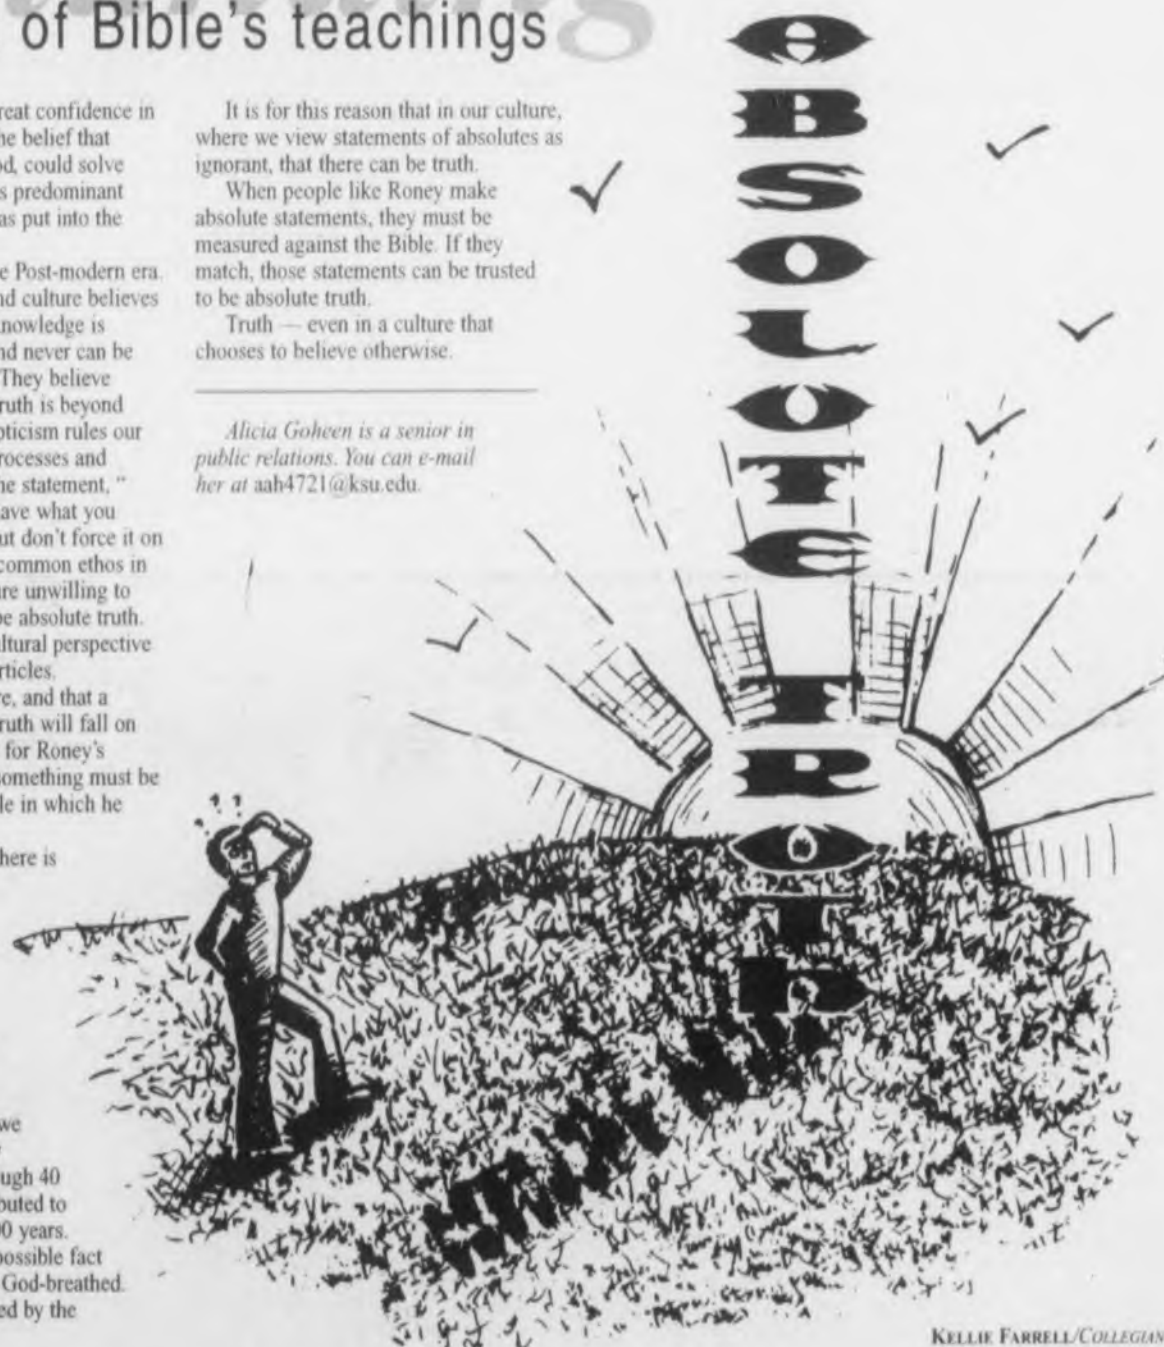

When people like Roney make absolute statements, they must be measured against the Bible. If they match, those statements can be trusted to be absolute truth.

Truth — even in a culture that chooses to believe otherwise.

Bias influences coverage of violence nationwide

The shooting deaths of two Columbine High School students, Nicholas Kunselman, 15, and Stephanie Heart, 16, this past Feb. 14 made national news, but did anyone hear about the two 17-year old Wilson High School sweethearts, Andre Wallace and Natasha Marsh, who were shot to death Feb. 8?

Wallace was a good student and captain of the football team. Marsh was an honor student. Both were going to college after graduation in June.

Wallace was involved in a scuffle at a high school basketball game at Wilson High School. Later, while Wallace was helping Marsh unload groceries into Marsh's mother's house, both were killed in a drive-by shooting.

The argument could be made that in the wake of the Columbine massacre last April 20, the added tragic deaths of Kunselman and Heart makes this incident, although not any more tragic, at least more newsworthy.

But Wilson High School has had its share of tragedy, too. Earlier this school year, Wilson student Nathasha Adams also was killed.

Neighboring Ballou Senior High School has suffered through five violent deaths during this school year. With the murder of 16-year-old Anthony Cooper on Feb. 10, this school district has had a total of 15 students die by violence since school began this past September (as compared with 12 students and one teacher killed in the Columbine massacre).

So what's the difference between the deaths of the Columbine students and these others? Columbine High School, as is Littleton as a whole, is populated predominately by those who are upper middle class and white. These other high schools, as well as most of the people who live in this other school district, are poor and black.

And where is this other school district located? Washington, D.C.

So what makes the deaths of the Columbine High School students more relevant and thus more newsworthy than the deaths of the high school students in Washington? Nothing.

Truth be told, the murderous violence in Washington is more relevant to the citizenry of the United States.

It's more relevant because this violence is occurring in the nation's capital, the capital of the most powerful and wealthiest society in the history of the world and only spitting distance from where the legislative powers of the Senate and House of Representatives sits.

This violence is more relevant because it is not a one-time incident, but has occurred last year and the year before that and the year before that, et cetera. And as things stand, it's apparent this violence will continue next year and the year after that and the year after that ad infinitum.

This violence is more relevant because it not only is occurring in Washington, D.C., but also is epidemic in New York City, Chicago, Detroit, the Kansas City area, Los Angeles, Miami, Philadelphia and Dallas — all across our nation in nearly all urban areas with a resident minority underclass.

This now raises the question of why the news media across the nation reported on the Littleton killings and not any of these others? Even the Washington Post buried most of these local killings deep within the bowels of the paper.

The answer, of course, is that the journalists who write the stories and the editors and the powers that be who decide what is to be reported on and what is to be submitted for public perusal are themselves predominately white and middle class.

As sociologist Herbert Gans has described in his classic book "Deciding What's News," newspaper editors and TV news producers choose to report on stories that are relevant to themselves. It is more relevant to white middle-class journalists when white middle-class youths get killed in a white middle-class neighborhood than when minority underclass youths are slain in the inner city.

It's not that the newsrooms across the nation are filled with racists and bigots or that they purposely are being racially biased. It's just that these white, middle-class journalists are incognizant of the minority underclass culture and thus can't relate to it and subsequently don't report on it.

Things are improving. The newsrooms used to be filled with white middle-class men with the result being that only stories that were relevant to these men got reported on. Now that there are more women journalists, more stories are being reported on that traditionally were women's issues such as women's health concerns, day care, education and family stability.

As these new issues became reported on and brought to the nation's attention, people and politicians began to debate possible solutions to these problems. Look at what is being spewed today by the people running for political office. It all is education, day care, health care and family stability.

But we can't wait for minorities to fill more of the decision making positions in newsrooms before these issues make it to press, not as long as the minority underclass is getting gunned down in the streets.

It is a necessity for these issues and concerns of the minority underclass be reported upon if there is going to be any serious national debate on how these issues and concerns are going to be resolved.

As long as racial bias continues to exist in the national media, racial bias also will continue to exist in the social discourse of the nation. In the meantime, minority underclass high school students are going to die.

Student feedback improves 2nd year of fair

By MAGGIE MARTIN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Everything from philosophy to biochemistry as well as 68 other K-State academic programs and services were represented at the K-State Academic Majors Fair on Wednesday in the K-State Student Union.

"A group of advisers and administrators saw a need for a one-day, one-location event for students to learn more about academic majors and minors," said Tinsley Furry, coordinator of the Academic and Career Information Center and co-chairwoman of the event.

"We are very pleased with the turnout of both departments and students," she said.

After last year's fair, surveys were sent to students who attended. They provided information to help the steering committee determine where improvements needed to be made.

In its second year, the fair focused more on secondary majors and minors and the increased marketability that they give students when they go out to work, Furry said.

Also, this year a table called "Can't find what you're looking for?" was set up to help students identify where the program they were interested in was located.

A student interested in speech pathology might not realize that it is in the communication sciences and disorders program, Furry said.

Stephanie Spencer, freshman in pre-nursing, came to the fair looking for new opportunities.

"I was able to look at class lists for different majors and different job opportunities for those majors," she said.

"The most beneficial thing was having people explain everything to you. It's easier to understand when you actually talk to someone."

Nicole Niehues, sophomore in elementary education, said she came to look for a new major.

"I wanted to look into advertising and medicine. I was able to pick up the information to take with me, rather than trying to keep it in my head," she said.

A new program displayed at the fair was the Degree Audit Reporting System. The system will be available March 6 through KATS.

Through the system, students will be able to see exactly what specific degree requirements are, what requirements have been met and what courses still need to be taken. Also, students can begin planning semester courses before meeting with an adviser.

Karen Pence, assistant dean of human ecology and co-chairwoman, also said she was pleased with the response from students at the fair.

Safety plays important role when choosing masseuses

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Some college students find getting a massage is a relaxing way to spend part of an afternoon.

However, safety is an important factor to keep in mind when choosing a massage therapist, said Susan Allen, director of the Women's Center.

Allen said one of the first things to do when looking for a place to get a massage is to ask around. She said students should ask friends or others who have received a massage and be thorough when doing the research. She said even the most thorough research might not be helpful, considering some therapists' ethical practices.

"Even if a person checks around, it might not be enough," Allen said. "If a person is being unethical, it doesn't mean that something will happen every time. If a therapist assaulted every client, it would put them out of business and would lead to suspicion."

Mary Ash, local massage therapist, said there are three basic categories that people should keep in mind when choosing a therapist or clinic — trust, draping and touch.

She said trust is going to a therapist and feeling comfortable with what he or she is doing. She said if it does not feel right or if something is uncomfortable, the person should say something or get up and leave.

"If it doesn't feel right, don't stay," Ash said. "It is important that there be a certain degree of trust, and if it isn't there, leave."

Ash said draping is another area that is crucial. She said it is highly unprofessional for any therapist not to use draping, and she said no training says it is correct for draping not to be used.

"Any person should be able to leave any piece of clothing on that they feel comfortable with," Ash said. "I have had people who feel comfortable with some clothing on, but if a person cannot work around it, then they have some limitations in their ability."

Ash said the final category, touch, also is important. She said clients should have the opportunity to ask where they are going to work and request that certain areas of the body be left alone.

She said if the client can ask in the beginning where the therapist is going to massage, and boundaries are crossed, the client will have an easier time getting out of the situation.

"A person on the table should always have control over what happens. It is their body," Ash said.

Allen said in some cases women who go to a massage therapist, whether it be in a business setting or private home, can be subject to improper touching or inappropriate behavior. She said women must know when to leave if they begin to feel uncomfortable in the environment.

"When something has happened and improper touching has occurred,

Mary Ash, local massage therapist, said people should keep three categories in mind when choosing a therapist or clinic:

Trust: Feel comfortable with what they are doing.

Draping: No training says it is correct for draping to not be used. Clients should be allowed to leave whatever clothing on that they want.

Touch: Clients should have the opportunity to ask where they are going to work and request that certain areas of the body be left alone.

the person should get up and leave," Allen said. "It is important to educate yourself and know that what is going on is not supposed to happen."

Ash said at this time, there is not a licensing procedure in the state of Kansas, although there is in several other states.

She said there are certifications that a therapist can receive, but the closest to licensing in Kansas is a national certification, which she said a number of therapists in Manhattan have. However, she said having a certification does not mean the therapist is ethical in his or her practices.

"There is not one specific regiment in which a therapist in Kansas can go through," Ash said.

Cats lose 1st home game 7-1

By MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

K-State's baseball homecoming after almost a two-year absence from Frank Myers Field didn't end with the Wildcats being crowned the king.

Creighton dominated K-State from the mound, allowing only five hits in the Blue Jays' 7-1 victory against the Wildcats.

"I don't know if it was the fact that the guys didn't believe we were going to play," head coach Mike Clark said, "but we didn't play with any emotion. We just weren't prepared mentally — it showed."

Scattered rain Tuesday and Wednesday morning led to a soggy playing surface in a game in which Creighton committed three errors while the Wildcats had four, resulting in four unearned runs for the Blue Jays.

Five pitchers took the mound for K-State, something Clark had planned for the afternoon.

With canceled games two weeks ago against Doane and last Sunday against Indiana, the decision was easy for Clark.

"One of the things we haven't got to do was throw some of these guys," Clark said. "We did a little better job of getting our pitches in the strike zone, but we've still got some work to do."

Sophomore Luke Robertson got the starting nod and took the loss to even his record at 1-1.

He pitched two innings and gave up four runs, two earned, on three hits while striking out four and walking one.

Freshman Derek Ver Helst threw two perfect innings, while freshman Todd Lundwall, sophomore Kurt Lehmann and junior Kelvin Day also pitched for the Cats.

The brightest spot of the day for K-State from the plate occurred in the third inning.

Senior second baseman Chad Tabor knocked in junior outfielder Chris Nelson on a sacrifice fly to score the Wildcats' only run.

"We were just going up there swinging," Clark said. "If it looked like it was in the strike zone, we were swinging at it. We just didn't have a good approach up at the plate at all."

Junior third baseman Josh Cavender led the Wildcats from the plate going two for four on the day.

K-State's next game will be its first Big 12 Conference game, of the season.

The Wildcats travel to College Station Friday to take on Texas A&M for a three-game series.

"If it looked like it was in the strike zone, we were swinging at it."

VICTORY AT LONG LAST

Win over Aggies snaps 11-game losing streak

A sigh of relief could be felt Wednesday evening at Bramlage Coliseum.

The K-State men's basketball team had snapped its 11-game losing streak, defeating Texas A&M 81-76.

The Cats (9-15, 2-11) survived a late Texas A&M (7-17, 3-10) surge to hold on to the victory. After the game, K-State head coach Tom Asbury said the win ranked with the team's better performances this season.

"I think we got into a pretty good offensive rhythm, and we were able to get good shots against their zone," Asbury said. "We took much better care of the ball, and we didn't have too many poor decisions in the second half."

It was during second-half play, when the Cats never surrendered a halftime lead, that the Cats were able to snap the losing streak.

The team had played a grueling schedule during the streak, with four of the past seven games against ranked opponents.

K-State senior forward Tony Kitt said the game was a big win for the program.

"For one, we won, and another thing, we put a big game together. It's a big relief," Kitt said. "It is definitely going to be a lot easier to go to class tomorrow."

Kitt scored 21 points in the contest, and he and senior guard Cortez Groves accounted for 51 of the Cats' 81 points.

Groves said after the game the victory was more important than his career-high 30 points, and that his teammates helped him throughout the game.

"For the most part, my shot was going down tonight, and I was able to get some open looks from my teammates," Groves said.

"The guys kept looking for me, and I was able to knock down some open shots."

Groves' performance helped the Cats shoot 58 percent in the first half, and K-State entered halftime on the crest of a 6-2 run, leading the Aggies 43-39. The team didn't take its first lead until there were 47 seconds remaining in the half, but the Cats never trailed again.

The second half began much the way the first half ended, with the Cats jumping on top with a 7-2 run, before Texas A&M went on a run of its own

Guard claims career-high score against Texas A&M

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

Judging by Cortez Groves' career-high 30 points Wednesday night, he probably wishes all his opponents wore Texas A&M jerseys.

In the Wildcats' 81-76 victory at Bramlage, the senior guard also set new career highs for three-pointers made, with eight, and assists, with six.

Groves' three-pointers are the most by a Big 12 Conference player in a single game this season. They also are the most by a Wildcat since Askia Jones' 14-trey performance on March 24, 1994.

Though on the losing end last season, Groves burned the Aggies in College Station for 17 points and a then-career-high five three-pointers.

Despite entering the game as the Cats' (9-15, 2-11) leading scorer with 15.1 points per game, the Aggies (7-17, 3-10) didn't seem to guard Groves closely throughout the contest.

"In the first half, they keyed in on me towards the end of the half," Groves said. "In the second half, I thought they would too. But they left me open, and I continued to hit the shots."

Groves led K-State at the half with 16 points, 12 of which were three-pointers.

Confidence crucial to Cats' successful play

The K-State women's basketball team needs something that's kind of hard to acquire.

But it's something the team members should have been gathering, both individually and collectively, throughout this season.

The Cats need some confidence.

If the players learned anything from Tuesday night's loss to Big 12 title contender Oklahoma, it should have been to play fearlessly. The Cats fell to Oklahoma after making a legitimate run toward the end of the second half.

Oklahoma stayed ahead largely due to the quick shooting of senior Phylesha Whaley, who hit four of five treys in the second half to secure the 64-56 win.

That's not to say K-State can't shoot, though. The difference between a player like Whaley and the Cats' own three-point shooters Kristin Rethman and Kim Woodlee is that Whaley put up a shot before anybody had the chance to think about it.

She probably didn't even think much about it herself; rather, she saw an open look and took it.

The Cats didn't do so throughout most of the game. They waited too long, holding off for the perfect look rather than an open look, and second-guessed passes and shot, that had they happened a little quicker, might have resulted in big plays.

It's not that the Cats don't have talent. They do, inside and out, but they still seem hesitant to maximize that talent.

The Sooners shut down the Cats' post play, although Oklahoma's tallest post player was only as tall as K-State's shortest. K-State senior center Olga Firsova had a distinct height advantage over everyone on the court, but looked afraid to put up a shot.

When she's on, and not so timid, Firsova can tear it up. Not in the same quick and powerful way that posts Angie Finkes and Nicky Ramage can, but it is Olga-style.

It's almost like she forgets all the shorter people below her and just realizes there's no one between her and the basket.

When Finkes and Ramage have it together on the same night, they're pretty exciting to watch. But Tuesday night, they largely were ineffective.

It's hard to gauge how much of that is Oklahoma's athleticism and how much is K-State's lack of confidence.

But when Rethman started tossing up treys all over the place in the hopes of drawing fouls or closing the gap between K-State and Oklahoma, it became clear there was more to the Wildcats than the fans saw Tuesday night.

It became clear that Rethman should have been shooting like that all along.

Instead, she and the rest of the team patiently waited for wide open looks that are rare against top teams.

Against a team like Oklahoma, with quick, talented athletes and a national ranking to boost confidence, the Cats should fight viciously and angrily. They shouldn't doubt their abilities.

They should be ready to show them off and to prove that sometimes a ranking is just a number and the team that believes the most will win.

With Tuesday night's loss, the Cats fell to 12-15 and lost their winning home record.

So when they take the court

Wednesday against Colorado for their last home match, they're probably going to believe they will not leave the court without a win.

The Cats have played eight ranked teams this season. They know how the best teams play. They've seen what it takes and the confidence with which they must play.

Stars aren't born by being afraid to shoot. They're born by taking the big shots and making them, much like Rethman and Woodlee tried to do Tuesday. But it was too little, too late, and the Cats didn't grab the win.

The only ranked opponent K-State has beaten this season is Iowa State, in Bramlage. Guess what? It beat a ranked Iowa State team last year at home, too. Knowing they probably could do it made a big difference in the way the Cats played the Cyclones this season.

Believing they can do it will make all the difference as the Cats hope to close out the season with a couple wins in an attempt to reach post-season play.

Golf team opens its season tied for 10th in tournament

By DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

The K-State men's golf team opened its spring season with a 10th-place tie at the Southwest Classic in Victoria, Texas.

The Wildcats shot a final round of 298 Tuesday, the third-lowest team round of the day, to jump six spots in the tournament standings with a three-round total of 906.

Sophomore Bryan Milberger led the squad with a 19th-place tie, shooting a 224 for the tournament.

"Bryan has played well this whole year," sophomore Scott McNeely said. "He's been real steady, swinging well, and shooting good scores. And I'm sure he'll continue that for the rest of his career."

K-State head coach Tim Norris also saw three Cats dramatically improve their totals in Tuesday's final 18 holes.

Josh Cook, the only senior to make the Texas trip, shot an even par 72 to lead the Cat rally and wrap up the 54-hole event. His score ties his best round total of his career, equaling the 72 he shot during the first round of last season's Arkansas State-Indian Classic.

McNeely cut five strokes off his last round's score with a three-over-par 75 to jump 10 places into a tie for 34th place.

His finish ties his season-best, matching his score at the Rocky Mountain Intercollegiate on Sept. 6-7.

Junior Dan Demory also moved up in the charts after shooting a two-over-par 74 on Tuesday, to escalate his round total 19 spots into a tie for 39th place.

"I think we showed signs of getting better," McNeely said. "We all came together in that last round — we showed ourselves that we can do it."

"We know we've got a good team, and if we had a better second round, we would've finished a lot higher than we did. But things can only get better."

The golf squad returns to action Sunday when it travels to Orlando, Fla., to participate in the Northern Invasion Intercollegiate, at the Orange County National Golf Club.

K-State will be the host school for the event that features Missouri and Illinois State.

to bring the game within one.

The Aggies were led by freshman guard Bernard King, who scored 16 first-half points, but was unable to get as many open looks through most of the second half before scoring four points as time ran down.

King ended the game with 25 points.

Asbury said K-State knew entering the game that it had to slow King down.

"We knew since Monday, when we started talking about this game, that we had to contain King," Asbury said. "But he shot nine of 16, so we certainly didn't shut him down."

K-State senior forward Josh Reid said King was a difficult player to stop.

"He is a great player. In the first half, he was just hitting open shots," Reid said. "He is a great player."

Reid in his own right provided valuable minutes for the Cats in the second half, a half in which he was able to hit critical shots and score seven points.

Asbury said it was important to have Reid and fellow forward Travis Reynolds back in the mix.

"That is the first time that we have had both Reid and Reynolds together where they could have any success," Asbury said.

Asbury and the Cats' next test is on the road Saturday against Texas Tech.

"At our stage where we are at right now, every game is critical," Asbury said.

Texas A&M head coach Melvin Watkins said his team did a poor job guarding Groves.

"He really did hurt us tonight," Watkins said. "Defensively, we just didn't do a good job. Guys are gaining confidence on us because they don't feel our pressure is causing them any problems."

On the heels of the school's longest losing streak since the 1945-46 season at 11 games, Groves' three-point buckets could not have come at better times in the game.

In the first half, three of Groves' treys either tied the game or gave K-State the lead. Groves' four second-half rain-makers kept the pesky Aggies at bay. In fact, starting at the 17:17 mark in the second half, Groves made three consecutive three-point buckets.

As far as Groves is concerned, his career performance can be explained easily.

"They just left me open, and I was able to get my shots tonight," Groves said.

Head coach Tom Asbury said he doesn't believe it's that simple.

"I don't know that he comes into this game with any different mindset than any other," Asbury said. "I don't think he just says, 'I'm going to go out and have a dynamite game.' I don't think it works that way. I think he just got off to a pretty good start."

Asbury also said Groves didn't let the ball stick in his hands, meaning that on occasion, Groves can stall the offense if he holds the ball too long and forces a shot.

"He had a couple possessions in the second half when he started to do that, and we took him out and put him back in," Asbury said. "If he just moves the ball, he'll get it back."

"That's what happened tonight. When he got it back, he was wide open."

Poet to make 1st K-State visit

By CHRISTIE VANOVER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A celebration changed his life. Corey Cokes attended a holiday party where he was asked to bring a gift that was not purchased at a store. He chose to recite a poem.

"It was fantastic. It was overwhelming," he said. "You could hear a pin drop when I was performing, and when I finished, the whole place just erupted. It did a lot for my self confidence."

Since then, the once bottled-up boy publicly has expressed his views on numerous occasions, including his victory performance in 1996, when he won the National Slam Poet contest.

A renowned poet, Cokes will introduce his controversial poetry to Kansas for the first time in a live performance at 7 p.m. tonight at the K-State Student Union's Union Station.

The Virginia native experienced many things he despised and disagreed with growing up, but he said because of how and where he grew up, he had to deal with them.

"I couldn't really voice my opinion. I bottled things up," he said. "But one day, I couldn't do it anymore, so I started writing and focusing."

Cokes said he most is inspired by issues of injustice.

"What really inspires me is when I see something that is unjust or unfair, or when I see something that is a lie and that doesn't make sense," he said. "It gets under my skin."

Cokes recently began touring universities and clubs throughout the United States. He said he enjoys performing his poems to college students because they are at a point in their lives where they can change with little consequence.

"They aren't really scared of losing anything because they don't have anything materially," he said. "I want these young adults to open their eyes and realize that all these horrible things out here affect them whether they believe it or not."

Cokes said he has had a fantastic response, crossing many generations. After a 19-year-old student, an 83-year-old man and 50-to 60-year-old professors praised his work, he said he realized the work was growing.

"I was touching on issues that different people could identify with or at least appreciate," he said.

Cokes said he doesn't concentrate too much about how his audience will receive him.

"You have to accept praise as well as the criticism," he said. "I can't expect everyone to like what I'm doing. Just because I dig it doesn't mean everyone else should or will."

"Two-hundred people could show up, but I'm willing to take the chance that one person will hear me," he said.

"It's worth me flying way out there for that one person. If I move them, it may trigger another thought. It may move them to do something. All it takes is one."

Although he said his work might not be for everyone, he suggested people take a chance to lend an ear to writers.

"You never know what that person has to offer. You never know how powerful, useful and important they can be," he said. "You can't discount anyone."

Even though the performance is something different, Hank Byrd, sophomore in mass communications, said he thinks the activity will be good for students.

"The spoken word transcends all races," Byrd said. "Corey Cokes will be something new, but I think he will be received well."

Shawn Stephens, senior in information systems, said he is pleased with the variety of events taking place this month to honor black history.

"I've learned about white history my whole life," he said. "We don't learn enough about our own heritage. Learning about black history makes me feel good about being black and it's good for people of different, cultures to learn."

Bill proposes tax credits for donors

By JENNIFER RYAN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A bill in the Kansas House of Representatives' Taxation Committee would allow tax credit for donating organs or blood.

There is concern that the bill is unlawful because federal law prohibits the sale of organs. However, the proposed bill might be a way around this since the state, not the recipient, is involved, said James Shanteau, professor of psychology at K-State.

"Taxes have been used to reduce perceived risk in other areas, e.g., economic development. At this time, no one knows whether such a tax credit will help. But it is hard to see how it could hurt the rates of donation," Shanteau said.

The bill, introduced Jan. 27, proposes a tax break of $10 per pint of blood and $300 per organ on income or real estate taxes.

"It will take a lawyer to determine whether the proposed tax credit is legal or not," Shanteau said. "However, it may not violate the law since the state, not the recipient, is providing the incentive. That is, the state does not care who gets the organ, only that someone does. The federal law clearly says that one person cannot pay another for their organs. However, the proposal does not involve a transfer of funds from a recipient to the donor."

Rep. Jene Vickrey, R-Louisburg, said the committee is discussing the bill, and no movement has been taken on it yet.

"Right now, it's in limbo. We don't know if the bill will ever turn into anything. At first blush, it looked like a very good idea — a workable idea, but I would prefer to limit the tax break just to organ donations," Vickrey said. "I support the tax credit for organ donors. I have four children, and one day maybe one of them will be in the situation that they are waiting for an organ."

"There are other ways than a tax break we are also looking at. We looked at providing an incentive to sign the organ donor form when you renew your driver's license. We are also looking at developing an awareness program. It is a problem we're looking for a solution for."

Rep. Doug Gatewood, D-Columbus, said he plans to vote no on the proposal.

"I question whether it is in compliance with federal regulation, but there will be a reviewer to look at the statutes it might conflict with. A tax credit is just like retailing an organ. Organ donations should be given for humanitarian reasons rather than monetary reasons," Gatewood said.

Rep. Tom Sloan, R-Lawrence, introduced the bill and said he expects the committee to make a recommendation or vote by the first or second week of March.

Sloan said the benefit of the tax break is that more people will become donors and live. From his perspective, he said, there are no drawbacks.

Shanteau said even though the tax break might violate federal regulation, it is important to encourage organ donation.

"Organ donation is one of the marvels of modern medicine," Shanteau said. "Organs such as kidneys are routinely transplanted, with success rates approaching 90 percent. Moreover, the success rates for more difficult transplants, such as hearts and livers, have been steadily rising. Thus, the technology of transplantation has developed rapidly as a lifesaving procedure with promises of even more success in the future."

"A major roadblock, however, has been the inability to deliver the miracle of transplantation to many patients in need. This is not due to lack of skilled surgeons or hospital facilities. Rather, it is due to a persistent shortage of organs. This shortfall reflects, in part, better medical technology and improved immunosuppressant drugs. However, the biggest reason for the shortage is simply the lack of sufficient donors," he said.

The United Network for Organ Sharing reports there are more than 66,000 people waiting for transplants. Most are waiting for kidneys (44,000), livers (14,500) and hearts (4,000). In 1998, there were 21,000 transplants performed based on 5,800 cadaveric donations and 4,200 living (kidney) donations. UNOS estimates that a new name is added to the transplant waiting list every 16 minutes. More than 20,000 die each year waiting for organs.

"I have seen many suggestions for increasing rates of organ donation," Shanteau said. "Many of these are illegal, such as paying people, and others are impractical, such as keeping a national database of organ donors so that these folks can be rewarded somehow. The proposal for a tax credit is a novel idea. I am in favor of exploring the idea further. Until I hear more about details, however, I am taking a 'wait and see' attitude."

home COOKING

Area couple provides variety of homemade baked goods

It was 4:30 in the morning, and Margaret Feyh saw the lights on at the Friendship House next door.

Employees at the Friendship House in Wamego start their day by making cookies, cinnamon rolls, salads and breads from scratch.

Margaret Feyh and her husband, Francis, bought the restaurant almost two years ago. Since then, there have been a number of changes.

"There's more variety on the menu," Ann Ballenger, employee, said.

When the couple took over, they said they wanted to keep some of the old items and incorporate new ones.

"When Francis and I opened the store, we wanted to add a few items to the specials served everyday," Margaret Feyh said.

The couple still serve most of the original menu items, including eight varieties of cookies and homemade cinnamon rolls.

Diane Ballentine, resident of Onega, Kan., said she goes to the Friendship House during her lunch breaks.

"I like the soups and sandwiches, and the cinnamon rolls are delicious," she said.

"The cinnamon rolls are definitely my weakness."

In addition to the larger menu, the clientele has grown, including customers from Wamego, Topeka and Manhattan.

said reservations are required for that night.

"It's usually a full house," she said.

The next supper night is scheduled for March 11. Margaret Feyh said the restaurant is going to serve shrimp alfredo along with the prime rib.

The Friendship House caters to individuals as well as parties.

It has catered several wedding rehearsals and small group meetings.

Margaret Feyh worked as an insurance agent at Blue Cross and Blue Shield before she bought the Friendship House. Her husband still has his second job for Caterpillar in Wamego.

The idea of not working for a chain or corporate office is what enticed Margaret Feyh to buy the Friendship House.

"I like the fact that I don't have to deal with corporate goals," Margaret Feyh said.

"It's more realistic, and I can make my own decisions."

Seeing the same customers day after day is what Francis Feyh said he likes most about owning the restaurant.

"There's a lot of regulars, and you get to know a lot of people," Francis Feyh said. "There's a lot of retirees from Manhattan that are starting to come in."

Occasionally, the couple are assisted by other family members.

"My daughter and grandchildren come up from Olathe to help out sometimes," Margaret Feyh said. "My daughter is a very good waitress."

She said her grandchildren have expressed interest in helping with the business.

"My grandchildren think it would be fun to work here," she said. "We make it fun."

The one thing Margaret Feyh said keeps the restaurant popular is its home-cooked style.

"There's no pre-mixes. That's what makes this place," she said.

"It's a comfortable place to eat. It's good food, and it's good for you."

The Friendship House in Wamego serves a variety of homemade items. The restaurant is open from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. Tuesday through Saturday.

"The business has certainly grown," Becky Riniker, manager, said. "There's a bigger lunch crowd than there ever used to be."

Riniker, a Friendship House employee for six years, said there were some people who traveled from as far as Missouri to dine at the Friendship House.

Once a month, the restaurant opens to serve prime rib during the evening, Margaret Feyh which makes it more accessible to catching the flu."

Sara Rieger, junior in dietetics, said when the flu does strike, plenty of water and clear foods are best.

"When a person gets sick, it is always best to drink plenty of water, soup broth and clear fluids," Rieger said. "Whole substances are not the best when you have the stomach flu because it irritates the stomach."

Along with eating the right types of food, basic health practices also can prevent the flu from attacking.

Reita Currie, health educator at Lafene Health Center, said catching the flu results from being around a lot of people.

"A good diet with plenty of juices and fruits along with following the food pyramid will help keep the body healthy," Currie said.

"Avoiding stress and getting enough sleep are also important factors in preventing the flu."

Currie said the best way to get better once you have the flu is to get plenty of rest.

"Avoid smoking, as it makes the immune system weaker, exercise and always take time to relax," she said. "If a student does get the flu, please don't wait for it to go away. Come to Lafene and have a physician look at you."

"Each student has paid a fee that covers doctors appointments," Currie said. "Prescriptions are not covered, but here at Lafene the prices are lower than the communities."

There is a Biofeedback program at Lafene available to help students if they have questions or concerns about their health.

Getting a flu shot at the beginning of each year also can help prevent the onslaught of the flu. Flu shots are a non-nutritional way to remain flu free. They run between $5-10 and are good for the entire year.

"The flu shots are really helpful," Higgins said. "I have seen great results, even if one gets the flu, due to the shot, it will not be as severe and students will not have the flu as long."

Vitamin-rich foods can help prevent sickness

By CASSIDY HILL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Food can keep you from being the next person hit with the cold and flu.

Mary L. Meck Higgins, an extension nutrition specialist, said that during the winter, the flu is easier to catch since most of the time people have their doors and windows shut.

"People keep their doors and windows shut during the winter to keep out the cold," Higgins said. "Germs are passed around easier because no air is circulating with outside air."

She said by eating right, people might prevent the flu from ever affecting them.

"Vitamins A, C and E, along with minerals and a health balance in diet, can help to prevent catching the flu," Higgins said. "To get a good source of vitamin A, people need to eat foods like apricots and carrots; a good source of vitamin C is in citrus fruits, avocados, bananas, sweet potatoes and berries. These vitamins help protect the skin barrier as well as also healing tiny cuts in the skin."

Vitamin E is found in fat soluble foods such as nuts or whole grain products, Higgins said. She said the vitamins are antioxidants and protect cells from holding extra oxygen.

"All of the vitamins have an anti-oxidant. When a cell has loose or free oxygen it causes damage to that cell," she said. "An anti-oxidant works against that and protects the cell from having excess oxygen."

Higgins also said during mid-terms, students are easily stressed and lack sleep.

"During mid-terms, students have a huge stress build-up and usually don't get enough sleep," Higgins said. "This causes a person's immune system to go down,

bird BROTHERS

PHOTOS AND STORY BY MIKE SHEPHERD

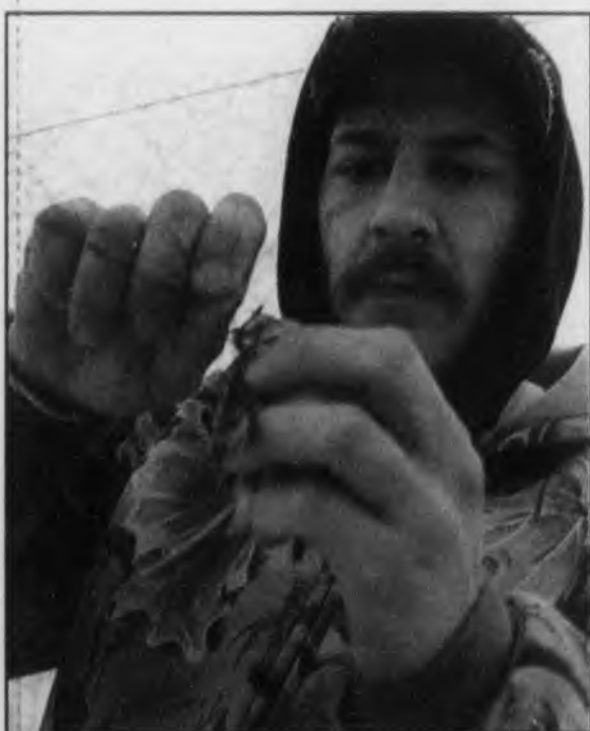

TOP RIGHT: As the sun rises over the hills of Marshall County, Jim Rivers tosses a stake over a net to fellow research assistant Luke Maylor so the net can be secured. The men would be on site and set up before 8 a.m. and would catch birds until noon.

RIGHT: Jim Rivers (right) and Chad Runco use binoculars to look for any other birds that might be left in an area near Black Vermillion Marsh. As noon approached, most of the birds had been caught or had flown out of the area. Still, a few remained, and they caught two more in their final attempt.

Field researchers unite with nature in hunt for tree sparrows

Chad Runco loves birds. His passion started as a casual hobby in high school, when he glanced in his backyard every so often. As he made his way through high school, he suffered from depression. He made it through and came to K-State in 1993, where he met a woman and fell in love. They married in 1996. They divorced in 1998. "That hit me hard, because I wanted to stay in the marriage," said Runco, a K-State biology research assistant. "I lost 31 pounds that summer." Both times, he turned to birds for peace of mind. "Birding allows me to get away in my own little world," he said. "I'm not a big people person. "It's nice to just get away when I need to."

The project

On the last day of pheasant season in January, Runco and Jim Rivers, another research assistant, were among the handful of orange-clad hunters near Black Vermillion Marsh in Marshall County. Only they weren't wearing orange, and they weren't hunting pheasants.

Instead, they were after American tree sparrows, a little brown bird about four inches long with a dark patch on its breast and a yellow spot on the underside of its bill.

For Runco, it was a way for him to get out in nature.

For Rivers, it was a way to kill some time before he leaves for New Zealand next month to start another bird project.

Together, their efforts are for K-State biology professor Fred Wilson, who's continuing a project he started in 1997 on the seasonal reproduction of tree sparrows.

"Many animals breed seasonally — their reproduction timed to occur when conditions in their environment is favorable for the young to survive," Wilson said. "We are trying to find out how reproduction becomes timed so that conditions are favorable."

The experiment gets its funding through the National Science Foundation. Wilson said he expects to get $161,000 over the next two years, which is all the longer he expects the project to run.

Every year, Wilson sends out a handful of research assistants to gather some birds. This year, it was Rivers and Runco's job to get the 450 birds needed.

"If we can understand seasonal reproduction, then we could devise a way to get animals to reproduce out of season," Wilson said.

Tree sparrows are photoperiodic, which means their reproduction is controlled by daylight.

"By manipulating daylight, we can control what part of reproduction cycle they're in," Wilson said.

The birds spend the winter in Kansas, where there are short days. As the weather warms, they migrate back north

On the marsh

"Do you think we ought to try here again, or move a little farther down?" Runco asks.

"They seem to be pretty active down there," Rivers concludes, pointing 60 or so yards down the dirt road to a patch of sorghum wheat.

At night, the birds nest together. As the sun rises, they begin to look for food. With two 15-by-30-foot mist nets in place, Rivers and Runco start from 100 yards back and begin to walk toward the nets.

The birds, unaware that they are about to be caught, move up as well. At the last moment, Rivers and Runco charge the net, hoping a few birds cannot divert their flight and go around the net.

Some days are slow. Others are plentiful. This was a good day. They caught 138 birds.

"That's more than double our previous one-day total," Rivers said. "That day was real good for us due to the snow covering up their food resources. The birds forage on the ground, and any snow limits where they can forage."

As they packed up their nets and loaded their truck, Runco made one more observation about the prosperous day.

"It's going to be a smelly ride back to Manhattan," he said.

ABOVE LEFT: Chad Runco, research assistant in K-State's Division of Biology, says one of his favorite things to do is go birding in the afternoons. "Birding allows me to get away in my own little world. It's nice to just get away when I need to," he said.

LEFT: Jim Rivers eyes a field of sorghum wheat, looking for a flock of tree sparrows. The birds nest overnight in the field together and only start to move around as the sun rises.

good job of educating students, but the mass exodus of graduates of Kansas universities to other states hurts businesses.

"Any time that jobs go unfilled, it makes the work that much harder for the company," he said. "Kansas is a highly technical state. The share of wages and employment attributed to high-tech industries is higher than the national average."

Kansas ranks second in the nation in the number of science and engineering graduate students per million in state schools, Day said. Kansas is second only to Massachusetts.

Kansas also is second in the region in terms of relative size of technology base, he said. Colorado is No. 1 in the region.

However, Kansas does not have the image of a highly technical state, Day said. People see Kansas strictly as an agricultural state. Twelve percent of the state's employment and 20 percent of the state's wages are in high-technology industries, which beats the national average of 10.4 percent employment and 17.6 percent of wages.

"We're trying to change that image of Kansas," Day said. "Graduates might not even know these jobs are here."

Home Again tries to bring together Kansas educated scientists and engineers and Kansas companies needing employment, Wilson said.

The Home Again Web site facilitates communication between employers and job seekers. The job seekers can post their resumes on the Web site while the companies post advertisements for employment.

Response thus far has been quite positive toward the efforts at reaching past Kansas graduates, Wilson said. In a survey sent to several thousand Kansas graduates outside the state, 4 to 5 percent responded.

"There has been some really positive feedback," he said. "Many can't move back to Kansas but say the program sounds great."

Negative responses have been few, but were directed toward the state and not the program, Wilson said. Five of the responses mentioned not returning to Kansas due to the Kansas Board of Education's ruling to de-emphasize evolution. The negative feedback, though, has not discouraged the program's efforts.

"We're competing between states for the best talent, and we want to keep our graduates here," Wilson said. "We hope, soon, we'll find some matches of people and companies."

face with an issue by familiarizing state representatives with those who policies directly affect.

"We had about 80 appointments today with various legislators," Lenkner said. "There were about 50 students total that participated."

A group of K-State students and staff took part Tuesday in Cats in the Capital, a program that introduces state legislators to K-State projects, said Student Body President Jason Heinrich.

"It's a time for K-State to show off its stuff," Heinrich said. "We had booths set up with food and different informational material, mainly for legislators to see what's happening at K-State."

Food products manufactured by K-State attracted those passing through the Statehouse's first-floor rotunda to take a look at the material distributed by K-State representatives, Sue Peterson, assistant to President Jon Wefald, said.

"Cats in the Capital reminds people that we're here," she said. "It lets people feel good about K-State and lets students meet and visit with legislators and staff."

While Lenkner said the day was a sort of thank-you for those who work in the capital, Heinrich said his visits with at least five legislators allowed him to discuss the importance of making a college education available for everyone.

"We just talked about the value of education in Kansas and how it contributed to the state economy," he said. "We also talked about how students should be able to afford college, either by lowering tuition or increasing financial aid."

Peterson said both Cats in the Capital and State Education Day serve as reminders to state legislators that students deserve a say in state policy making.

"They're both good because they're student-centered," Peterson said. "Legislators get the chance to meet the students and find out what their perceptions are and what issues are important to them."

stabbing and beatings. No guards were hurt.

The prison, which opened in 1989, is situated on 270 acres of forest land 20 miles south of the Oregon state line.

Guards were able to put down another riot at Pelican Bay last August by firing tear gas and rubber bullets.

A guard suffered a fractured cheekbone, but no inmates were seriously hurt.

In 1997, six inmates were killed in clashes between cellmates at the prison.

In an apparently unrelated case, two former guards are charged with violating the civil rights of Pelican Bay inmates.

A federal grand jury indictment made public Wednesday accuses E. Michael Powers and Jose Ramon Garcia of conspiring to arrange assaults on prisoners, one of them fatal.

Garcia already is serving a state prison sentence on similar charges. Another former Pelican Bay guard, David E. Lewis, was convicted of civil rights charges Feb. 14 for shooting a prisoner after a fight in 1994.

The most creative design went to the team "Eggzactly," from Anthony Middle School. Their design was constructed into several circular strips forming a ball shape with a box suspended in the center with yarn to hold the egg.

The team with the most splat went to Hillcrest School from Cuba, Kan.

"Although the only award we received was the biggest splat, I still think this was a great experience for the students," Curt Parry, Hillcrest School sponsor, said. "More than anything, they just get a chance to look around and see what it's like to get to the next level."

Byer said he was surprised to see so many eggs survive.

"I think the schools who have participated in the past have an advantage over the other schools," Byer said. "They can get ideas from past years' competition. A couple of the apparatuses that landed on the curve of the plastic that hung from the wall also have a slight advantage, but that's just the luck of the draw. We will treat them as a normal drop."

By BETH HARRIS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES — Carlos Santana, who first gained fame a generation ago with a searing guitar performance at Woodstock, capped a triumphant comeback Wednesday with a record-tying eight Grammy Awards.

The 52-year-old guitarist's multi-platinum "Supernatural" won album of the year. His first No. 1 single, "Smooth," capped a sweep of the main Grammys by winning song and record of the year.

Santana tied Michael Jackson's 1983 record of most Grammys on a single night.

"Music is the vehicle for the magic of healing," he said upon accepting the album of the year trophy, "and the music of 'Supernatural' was a sign and designed to bring unity and harmony."

To a standing ovation, Santana performed "Smooth" just before winning his final award. He kissed singer Rob Thomas at the end.

Only a lack of a writing credit for "Smooth" prevented a record-breaking performance by Santana. The song of the year trophy went to Thomas and Itaal Shur.

"I want to thank Santana for taking this song to the moon," Shur said.

Another nominee whose career began in the 1960s, Cher, won her first Grammy for dance recording. She enjoyed her biggest commercial success last year with the hit single "Believe."

In a mild upset, Christina Aguilera beat out her fellow teen queen and former Mousketeer, Britney Spears, for the Grammy as best new artist. Even she was surprised.

"Oh my God, you guys," she said. "I seriously do not have a speech prepared whatsoever. I'm shaking right now."

Feuding soul divas TLC picked up two Grammys — for best rhythm 'n' blues performance by a group for their frank put-down of men, "No Scrubs," and best R&B album for "Fanmail." "No Scrubs" was also named best R&B song.

Sting sprang an upset in the male pop vocal category with a victory for "Brand New Day," beating out younger, Latin-influenced singers Marc Anthony and Ricky Martin. Sting also won for pop album.

"I felt the talent I was up against was extraordinary," said Sting, who also won for pop album. "I have 14 Grammys now and a very large mantlepiece."

Eminem won two awards: best rap solo performance and best rap album.

Two 1970s icons took home their first trophies ever: love god Barry White's "Staying Power" won best male R&B performance and Black Sabbath's "Iron Man" was honored as best metal performance.

Country's leading ladies, the Dixie Chicks and Shania Twain, won two Grammys apiece. George Jones, who had a near-fatal traffic wreck last year, won male country vocal for "Choices."

"We all feel really lucky," Dixie Chicks lead singer Natalie Maines said backstage. "The second album on a major label and to have both of them acknowledged by the Grammys is unbelievable."

Tony Bennett, a familiar winner in the traditional pop vocal performance category, was honored with his ninth Grammy for his tribute to Duke Ellington.

Thirty-one years after Santana headlined at the landmark Woodstock festival, he collaborated with younger singers such as Thomas of Matchbox 20, Lauryn Hill and Dave Matthews to make "Supernatural," which won the rock album Grammy.

Most of the guitarist's awards were presented before the television broadcast of the night's main awards, a three-hour show designed to emphasize musical performances more than trophy presentations.

"This is for all the people who don't have running water or electricity," said Santana, a native of Mexico. "If I could do it, you could do it."

Santana also won for rock performance by a duo or group with vocal, pop performance by a duo or group with vocal, pop instrumental performance, pop collaboration with vocals and rock instrumental performance.

"I think I was conceived to his music. He's an influence to me as a guitar player," said Chris Perez, the widower of Tejano singer Selena and a winner for Latin rock/alternative performance.

Committee to update K-State rape policy

By GINA KOHAKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Re-evaluating the current university rape policy is the focus of a committee of women from different departments across campus, said Susan Allen, director of the Women's Center.

"The policy was created around 1989, and back then there was a different way of thinking," Allen said. "We want to update the policy to show new ideas, especially that one can not assume permission for sex. If the girl does not say 'yes,' then the guy still needs to assume 'no.'"

The committee hopes to update different parts of the policy, including the method by which rapes are included in campus statistics, Melissa Divine, instructor of women's studies, said.

"Hazing committed by a fraternity or sorority are coined as campus statistics, but not sexual assault," Divine said.

One of the committee's focus is to provide accurate statistics on rapes involving students.

"It helps to know the extent of the problem. With better documentation, we can start to figure out how to find a solution," said Torry Dickinson, associate professor of women's studies. "We can also have a better sense if we are making progress."

The current policy also allows the accused rapist to review the complaint brought upon him before a panel review is assessed.

"The question is how much information do we need to give the accused in advance, because if he knows all the points he can counter them easily," Allen said.

The committee-members hope to figure out a way to protect women more in the policy, Allen said.

"Rarely a third party is witness to a rape, so usually it becomes he said, she said," Allen said. "It is easy to prove sex, not rape."

Allen said the university's policy is intended to be a secondary option for victims of rape. The university encourages the victim to alert the proper authorities in order to pursue criminal prosecution.

"The policy provides a range of punishments, including expulsion from school, if a woman doesn't actually want to press charges," Allen said.

Allen said many ideas are being considered to help increase awareness of the existence of rape.

"We are exploring the idea to apply for a grant. We are thinking of doing something to do with social-norm model, which is like the ads in the paper that tell students that most people really don't get drunk every weekend and that it is more normal to not get drunk," Allen said. "We want to apply the idea to date rape, letting them know that it isn't really normal but it does happen."

The most important issue on which to educate students is the facts about rape, Divine said.

"The trying problems of sexual assault is that we act as if it doesn't exist," Divine said. "It is treated like the stranger in the bushes when in actuality, 80 percent of all rapes are acquaintances, like the guy that sits next to you in class or a boyfriend."

Fuel prices might rise

By H. JOSEF HEBERT
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Already facing sticker shock at the gas pumps, motorists likely will experience more price jolts this spring and summer, energy experts said Thursday.

With crude oil prices high and supplies low, refiners are not producing as much gasoline as normal, a recipe for costlier fill-ups in the months ahead.

"There's going to be some finger-pointing if we enter the summer with $2-a-gallon gasoline," said Sen. Frank Murkowski, R-Alaska, chairman of the Senate Energy

72-year-old Texas woman executed

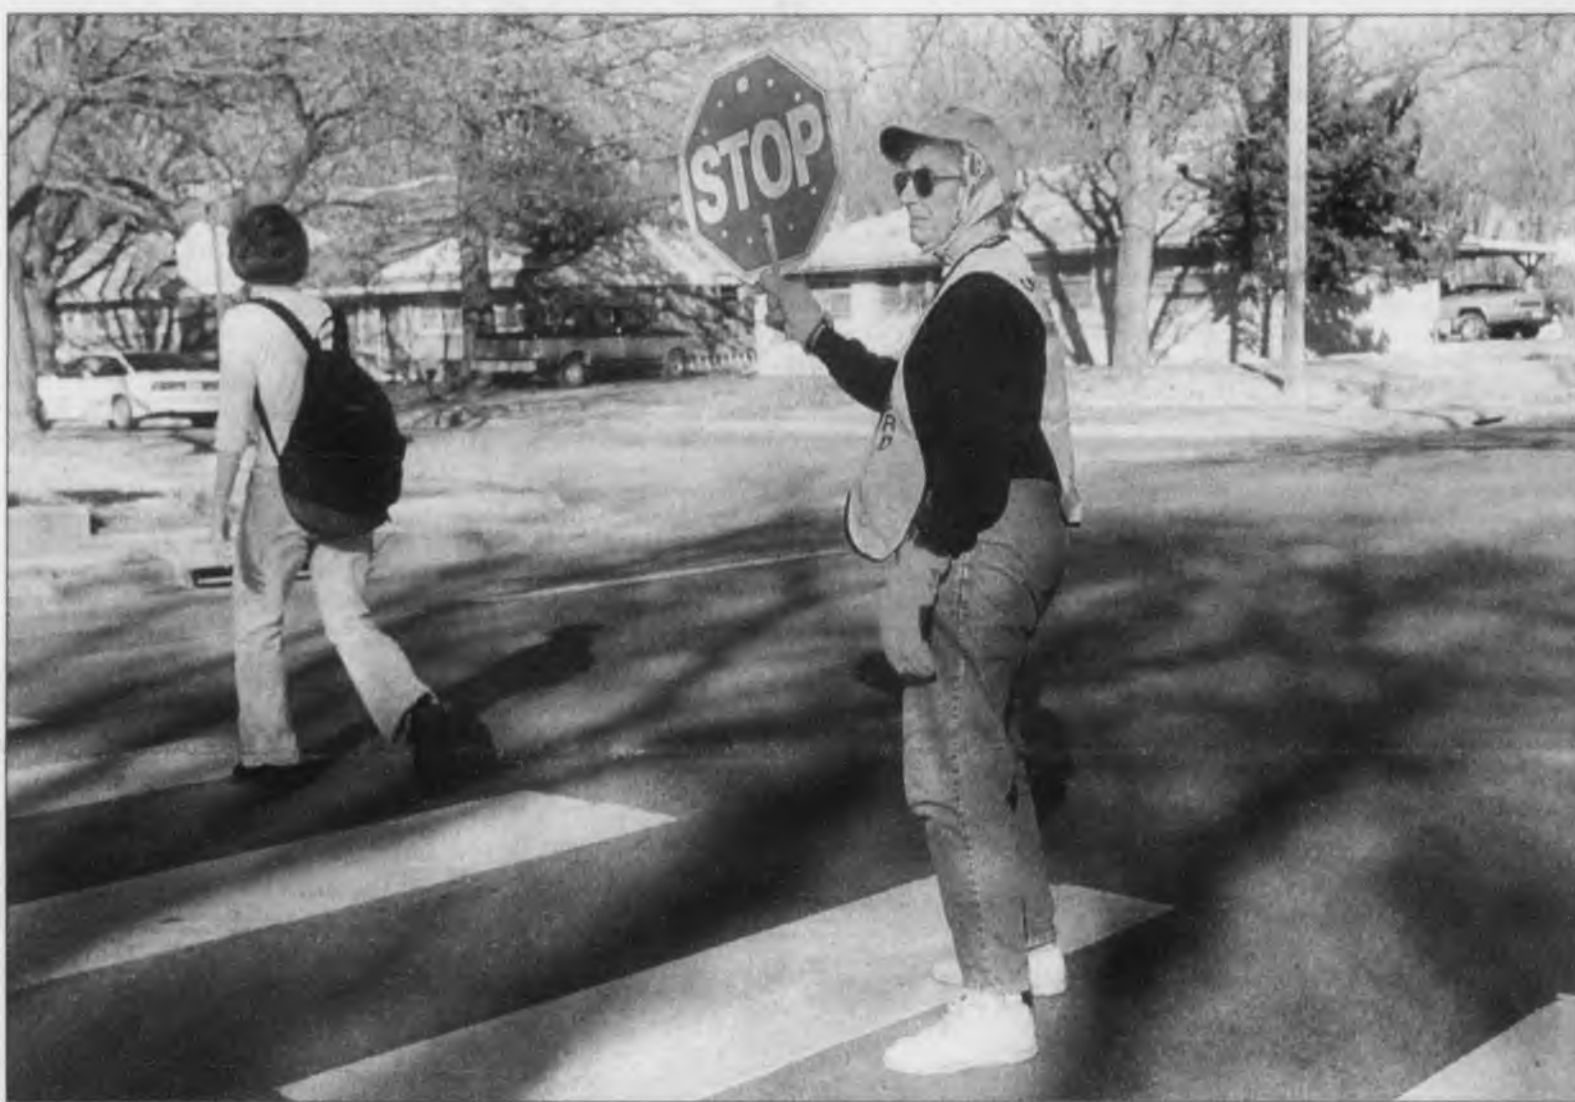

By MICHAEL GRACZYK
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

HUNTSVILLE, Texas — A 62-year-old woman was executed by injection Thursday after Gov. George W. Bush rejected her claim that she killed her fifth husband in self-defense and deserved a reprieve.

Betty Lou Beets became the fourth woman to be executed in the United States since the Supreme Court in 1976 allowed the death penalty to resume. She was the second woman executed in Texas since the Civil War.

She gave no final statement as she lay strapped to the death chamber gurney. She getting the opportunity to talk with people is Norma McNair's favorite part of being a crossing guard.

"Talking to the college students and the children from the grade school is what I mainly enjoy," McNair said.

Since February 1999, McNair has been a crossing guard stationed on Claflin Road.

Every day from 7:30 a.m. to 8:30 a.m. and from 3:15 p.m. to 4:15 p.m., she can be found sitting at her post dressed in orange and ready to help the many who call her "grandma."

"She has a real interest in what she's doing," said Sgt. Bob Saber of the Riley County Police Department. "She really cares about her kids."

Working in the morning often is more enjoyable for her than in the afternoon, because there are more students to talk to, she said.

"I enjoy the mornings because I get to talk to all of the college students," McNair said. "They're all really nice."

She said not only do they bring her delight, but some also bring gifts.

"One has brought me hot chocolate, and one girl brought me bread she had made," McNair said.

She said she was content being stationed on Claflin but wishes there were more children.

"This crosswalk isn't that busy," McNair said. "I wish I had more children."

She said the perfect location would be right outside one of the area elementary schools.

"Being right outside a school would be the most fun," McNair said. "Regardless of the weather or time of year, it's always busy. To me, that's a lot more fun."

"As the weather gets nicer, I hope to have more kids," she said.

Saber said McNair was an outstanding employee for the city.

"We've never received any complaints about her, which is important," said Saber. "She's pretty conscientious of what she does."

When McNair can be seen, so can her Powercats and American flag.

"I'm a big K-State fan," McNair said. "I have five kids, and my daughter is the only one who didn't go to K-State."

Her car is decked out with Powercat magnets and stickers, all to support the town she has lived in off and on since 1928.

Alongside her Powercats is the American flag she keeps attached to the chair she sits in while waiting for walkers.

"Last year, something bad was said about K-State because someone took a Nebraska flag and burned it," McNair said. "I put the flag up because it represents all 50 states."

She said the people always are pleasant, but the vehicular traffic is not.

"I find that we have some very thoughtless drivers, no matter if you have your sign out or not," McNair said. "Lights flashing or not, some people will drive right over you."

Deliberations continue in Diallo shooting trial in NY

ALBANY, N.Y. — Jurors deliberating in the murder trial of four white police officers who shot an unarmed black man asked the judge Thursday to reread them the law on a less serious charge: first-degree manslaughter.

Supreme Court Justice Joseph Teresi explained that, unlike second-degree murder — which requires proof of the officers intended to kill Amadou Diallo — manslaughter means they only intended to cause serious injury.

During his instructions before deliberations began Wednesday, Teresi gave the jury the option to consider charges other than murder.

Sean Carroll, 37; Edward McMellon, 27; Kenneth Boss, 28; and Richard Murphy, 27, each have pleaded innocent to second-degree murder. Conviction on that charge carries a sentence of anywhere from 25 years to life in prison.

Penalties for first-degree manslaughter range from 5 to 25 years. Other lesser charges include second-degree manslaughter and criminally negligent homicide, which could result in a sentence of probation without jail time.

The defense claims Diallo ignored the officers' repeated orders to halt, pulled out a black object in a threatening manner and remained on his feet as bullets flew. The object turned out to be a wallet.

The verdict could hinge on the defense claim that the officers unleashed the barrage because they thought Diallo had a gun and was threatening them.

The judge has instructed jurors, "A person who acts in self-defense is not guilty of any crime."

On Thursday, the jury — which has been sequestered — also asked to be read a transcript of the testimony of an eyewitness, Schirre Elliott. Earlier, they heard a transcript of testimony from Carroll and McMellon, who were the first to confront and shoot at Diallo.

Elliott says she watched from across the street when Diallo died in a hail of 41 bullets Feb. 4, 1999. The West African immigrant was hit 19 times.

When she first took the stand, Elliott appeared to hurt the defense by supporting allegations that the officers cornered Diallo in the tiny vestibule of his apartment building with their guns drawn and, without warning, opened fire. She also said the victim remained upright throughout most of the gunfire.

Pressed by the defense, Elliott also admitted making statements to both federal authorities and a news reporter that one of the officers shouted "He's got a gun!" before the shooting began. Prosecutors have said Elliott's account has changed too many times to be reliable.

Awards proof of popularity of Latin music sound in U.S.

LOS ANGELES — Such a "Smooth" segue.

Big Grammy wins by Carlos Santana and Christina Aguilera provide a high-profile lead-in for a Latin Grammys show that debuts next fall.

The Mexican-born Santana won eight Grammys on Wednesday, tying Michael Jackson's record for most awards in one night. Aguilera, whose father is from Ecuador and who plans to release a Spanish-language album this spring, was a surprise winner for best new artist.

The success of Santana and Aguilera and the high visibility of Hispanics throughout the ceremony emphasize the growing popularity of Latin performers and music — and so September's Latin Grammys will honor performers, producers and other music professionals recording in Spanish and Portuguese.

"Demographic trends show Latinos eventually will be the largest ethnic minority in the U.S.," said Ricardo Dopico, director of Latin music for the Recording Industry Association of America. "As a result of those sheer numbers, the Latin culture is going to continue to seep into mainstream culture."

Ricky Martin's performance at last year's Grammys helped kick the Latin sensation's career into high gear. Martin and fellow Latin singer Marc Anthony had nominations in top pop categories at Wednesday's Grammy show, which included a Latin musical segment featuring numbers in Spanish.

Latino awards presenters included Gloria Estefan, Jimmy Smits, Andy Garcia and Jennifer Lopez, perhaps the evening's most-talked-about celebrity with a gown cut in a loose V that left little to the imagination.

TAKE note

MTV millions MTV is promoting a countdown and $1 million giveaway this weekend, celebrating the music video that's been aired the most during the network's 19-year history.

Just don't ask how much that video, Peter Gabriel's "Sledgehammer," has been played. MTV won't tell you.

MTV says its closed-mouth policy is a way to avoid alienating record companies. It never tells how much it plays a video — even one like "Sledgehammer," which was made in 1986 — to avoid anyone building a case that it favors one artist or company over another.

"There's an incredible amount of interest in exactly how many times a video gets played," said David Sirulnick, executive vice president for MTV news and productions.

Video play, particularly on a popular MTV show like "Total Request Live," can make or break a disc's popularity.

Video time is even more prized as the number of opportunities for them to get played has shrunk over the past few years.

Nine of the 10 most-played MTV videos are from the 1980s, including the first one ever played on MTV, the Buggles' "Video Killed the Radio Star." The only 1990s video to make the cut was Pearl Jam's "Jeremy."

Other well-worn videos are the Aerosmith collaboration with Run DMC on "Walk This Way" and Dire Straits' "Money for Nothing," a song about MTV. "Sledgehammer" used stop-action editing and claymation, both innovative for its time, to create some arresting images, Sirulnick said Thursday.

The song also coincided with the peak of Gabriel's popularity and was hard to categorize in any one genre, he said.

TRIO members honored for accomplishments, dedication

By JAMIE BARRETT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State TRIO programs honored their members Thursday morning with an award ceremony in honor of Saturday's National TRIO Day.

TRIO, a program that serves students from first-generation college and low-income backgrounds, has been functioning at K-State since 1973. The program consists of four smaller programs: Upward Bound, Upward Bound Math/Science, Educational Supportive Services and the Ronald E. McNair Post-Baccalaureate Achievement Program.

Around 30 students were honored in each of these individual programs.

Laura Ciccantell, assistant director for Educational Supportive Services and student services coordinator for the McNair Scholars Program, said National TRIO Day is motivating to the students because they are being recognized for all the things they have accomplished.

"The purpose of this recognition celebration was to give the students the credit they deserved," Ciccantell said.

The celebration was small and consisted of the directors of the programs handing out awards to the students, but Becky Sinnes, junior in criminology and peer ambassador, said the program was important because the students have earned the recognition.

"All the students in TRIO have worked really hard to get where they are now and that is something that should be recognized," Sinnes said.

Kathleen Greene, director of Educational Supportive Services, said the celebration and National TRIO Day is important in a college atmosphere.

"The purpose of this recognition celebration was to give the students the credit they deserved."

— Laura Ciccantell, assistant director for Educational Supportive Services

"A recognition like this highlights for the students the importance of attending college and progressing toward earning a degree," Greene said.

Greene said the TRIO program was developed in the 1960s and has proved to be successful since its start.

"Most universities have at least one TRIO program," Greene said. "But we are lucky to have four here at K-State."

Greene said the graduation rate for seniors just in the Educational Supportive Services program is 71 percent, so the program has a high success rate as a whole.

"We have a high success rate with all of the TRIO programs," Greene said. "National studies have recognized the TRIO program for exemplary practices."

Sinnes said she knows firsthand that support and motivation help build successful futures.

"The best thing about the program is all the people that are around," Sinnes said. "Everyone is so supportive."

Student Senate passes election code changes

By DANEDRI THOMPSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate passed a bill Thursday night finalizing Student Governing Association election codes.

"It's not the prettiest thing, but it gets the job done," Travis Morgan, Senate elections chair, said.

The bill amended the SGA elections code, allowing the Elections Committee to count the write-in ballots.

Morgan said he haggled with the vendor providing online election services, VoteHere.net, about write-in ballots. Under original election guidelines, the vendor, not the committee, was to count all ballots, including write-ins.

Write-in ballots now will be cast in paper form and counted by hand by members of the Elections Committee, he said.

He said the write-in ballots will be secure.

The write-in ballots will be kept in the Office of Student Activities and Services through the duration of the election, but Gayle Spencer, OSAS coordinator, said the problems from last year's run off election will not happen again.

In the 1999 election, Leo Prieto, former student body presidential candidate, alleged that Joe Ashley, former elections chair, counted ballots before polls closed and told candidates the election was close. Student Tribunal found Ashley was found guilty of tampering with election results.

"No one is going to have any access to that information until the final results are given to us," Spencer said.

When students log on to KATS to vote, they will have to select whether they want to vote for any write-in candidates.

If they choose to vote for a write-in candidate for any office, KATS will print a ballot.

Students choosing to vote for a write-in candidate then would have to cast marked, paper ballots at the K-State Student Union's polling booth.

However, Morgan said only those wanting to cast a vote for a write-in candidate would have to use the paper ballots to vote. Other students still could cast their ballots electronically.

He said students won't be allowed to do a combination of the two.

"If you do it by hand, it's all by hand," he said. "If you do it electronically, it's all electronic."

The new changes won't change the election process much, he said.

"You can still vote anywhere. You can print out your write in ballot anywhere," he said. "You'll just have to bring your write-in ballot here."

voting information

■ Student Governing Association voting will begin at 8 a.m. March 6.

■ Online voting will continue 24 hours a day until March 8 at 6 p.m.

■ A polling booth in the K-State Student Union will close at 5 p.m. the first two election nights and 6 p.m. the final night.

■ Write-in ballots will be cast in paper form and will be counted by members of the Election Committee. Students must select the write-in option on-line, and KATS then will print a ballot.

Morgan said because it is a new system there are still kinks to be worked out.

"It's a pioneering effort," he said. "The fact that we have to count the ballots is kind of a necessary evil of growing pains."

Quiz game sign-up today

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Practice for midterm exams is available for K-State students in the form of a Union Program Council event this Saturday.

However, if the promise of study help is not enough to attract participants, then perhaps the added bonus of cash prizes will lure them in.

UPC's Issues and Ideas Committee will sponsor the Great Brain Games on Saturday on the second floor of the K-State Student Union. The event is a quiz competition that will reward the wisest of players with prize money, said Janet Bozarth, committee chairwoman and senior in English.

"The questions are general knowledge, but we'll also have some city and campus questions in there," she said.

Students interested in participating in the games should form teams of four to five players, Bozarth said, with four teammates playing at all times. Teams of five will have one player that serves as an alternate during certain stages of the game.

The team placing first in the competition will receive $400, with teams placing second and third taking home $200 and $100, respectively.

"The reason we started this was because it's expensive to be a student," Bozarth said.

The final deadline for sign-ups is 3 p.m. today in the UPC office. All participants must pay a $30 entry fee to UPC, which Bozarth said not only will cover the prize money but also will help fund future program projects. With this entry fee, all Brain Games players receive a T-shirt to wear during the competition.

The event will begin at 8:15 a.m. Saturday in the Union Main Ballroom, said program adviser Heide McBride.

"We want teams there as soon as possible so we can get started," she said.

McBride said participants should read up on the rules before heading to the games this weekend.

"I'd advise people to pick up an information pack as soon as possible," McBride said.

No relief in sight for rising gasoline prices

It's time to lace up the walking shoes. Gas prices have soared to astronomical levels recently, reaching above $1.40 in Manhattan for the first time in the memory of most students. Because the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries has cut back on the amount of oil it is sending abroad, costs have skyrocketed. So what can the United States and its fuel-guzzling citizenry do? Not much. Because the oil reserves of the United States are limited, it would be a dangerous move to dip into those reserves. Once they are depleted, the United States will become completely dependent upon OPEC and other foreign oil supplies. Should those countries decide to further reduce exports in the future, the United States would have no backup supply to which to turn. Instead, U.S. citizens will have to suck it up and deal with the higher prices. Certainly, this will not be easy. Americans are used to having gasoline readily available at affordable prices. Even now, with prices climbing ever higher, the cost of gasoline in the United States is lower than it is in European countries. The United States, then, will have to cope with the higher prices the same way Europeans and citizens of other countries do — they will have to drive less. Yes, it might mean walking an extra quarter of a mile to class. This could solve more than one problem — less spent on gas and less time wasted searching far and wide for a decent place to park. Or maybe it is time to pull out the bicycles. Lots of people have them, but few actually ride them frequently.

It is worth the money you will save to ride to campus. A final option is carpooling. It seems easy, but few people do it. Cramming a few more people in a car can save money. If Americans reduce the amount of fuel they consume, they eventually will be able to drive the prices downward. After all, what goes up must come down. We hope.

Hi, Jeff Elliott. As a Bible reader, I was just wondering if you noticed that Jesus kept his mouth shut about homosexuals, so maybe you should do the same.

Just because you think something is wrong doesn't make you a bigot or a hate monger.

Whatever happened to competition? Scrap Pepsi at this greedy university.

Tom Asbury for president.

Teams that don't make it to the NCAA Tournament go to the NIT Tournament, but where do teams like us go?

Congratulations to the K-State men's basketball team on a great game.

Yeah, Satan just called. He said it is pretty cold down there.

Asbury, sorry, it won't save your job.

Congratulations to the Cats. I've always been behind you. Go Cats.

Hey, Reed. Forget Topeka. Go to Plains, Kansas — widest Main Street in the U.S.A.

As I attended the K-State basketball game, I again realized that we do have the best fans ever.

Hey, Asbury. You won, but we still don't want you.

Is the news playing a cruel joke on me, or did K-State really just win a basketball game?

All this time I thought Anderson Hall was inefficient. Oh, boy, then I went over to the Foundation. That place is a six-story sparkling monument to inefficiency.

Sports Illustrated looks more and more like Playboy every February.

The Collegian opinion page is looking more and more like a church bulletin, as now a third member has published an article preaching about Christianity.

Only in the Bible belt would members of a newspaper staff devote so many trees to pushing their theological views on the rest of us. Thanks for your concern about our religious well-being, but we've heard enough.

Does the Collegian staff realize that Christianity isn't the only religion?

The men's basketball team had a great win over Texas A&M. We should sign our coach to a long-term contract before he gets away.

If independents got involved on campus as much as they whined, maybe they would meet more greys and realize, "Hey, these guys aren't so bad after all."

If you're tired of paying the movie prices, find a friend with AAA membership and get them to buy a bunch of tickets for $4.50.

Thank you Alicia Goheen for a well-written, well-thought-out article with a message that greatly needs to be heard.

Congratulations to the coaches and players for the Texas A&M win. Now go get Texas Tech and Baylor.

Someone killed their friend and gets probation? Where's justice?

Who wants to marry an ABUSER?

Fox should apologize for looking at millionaire's bank account, not background

Who wants to marry a multi-millionaire?

Or better yet, who wants to marry a multi-millionaire who has a record of physically abusing and threatening to kill his ex-fiancee?

For all of you single women out there who still would be willing to risk your life for this man, you are, fortunately, too late. Darva Conger has beat you to it. No pun intended. Now, the new bride is ready to annul the wedding, saying she just let things get out of hand.

Fox's "Who Wants To Marry A Multi-Millionaire?" was a two-hour special that 22.8 million viewers watched as Rick Rockwell chose a bride, Conger, out of a group of complete strangers. They were married on the same show where they met.

According to the Fox Web site, the New York Times reported Monday that Rockwell confirmed a restraining order had been issued against him nine years ago.

The Web site stated that on the same day, CBS News reported that Rockwell denied the accusations. Rockwell told CBS, "Relationships have ups and downs, but getting physical, for me, is not an option."

Rockwell's former fiancée, Debbie Goynne, wrote in a 1991 petition, "On several occasions Rick Rockwell threw me around and slapped me and hit me in my face." In the petition she stated that he had made threats on her life as well.

Goynne said Rockwell experiences severe emotional highs and lows. She filed the restraining order less than a decade ago when she broke off their engagement and he became violent.

A Los Angeles superior court judge signed a six-month protective order that barred Rockwell from coming within 100 yards of Goynne, her home or her place of work.

Perhaps Fox was too busy checking Rockwell's bank account to find the appropriate time to do a background check.

When I heard of the Fox special, prior to this update, I was outraged. This show demonstrates a hunger for money and outer appearances. It encourages complete strangers to unite in a lifelong commitment before even going on a first date.

There is no way that Rockwell and Conger even have the slightest clue of who their spouse really is.

Perhaps this is the only way Rockwell could get someone to marry him: Someone who is a complete stranger and who has no idea of his past, someone who has not seen him lose his temper. Thankfully, it looks like his plan did not work too well.

I dated someone for a long period of time before I found out about his out-of-control temper. His temper has left me with neck injuries that I will have for the rest of my life. His outbursts have left me, even to this day, with nights of crying myself to sleep and wondering what I did to deserve to go through hell.

Months went by before I found out who he really was. This goes to show that it can take you a long time before you find out who the person behind the mask really is.

You observe people through situations, both socially and one-on-one. You get to know their characteristics, and sometimes the ones you never suspected are brought to your attention through time.

I discovered who he really was when I was head-butted into a cement floor. I found out who he really was when the relationship was fizzling and he did everything imaginable to try to keep me from leaving.

You cannot discover who someone is on a TV special.

Conger did not seem to be picky in terms of choosing the man with whom she thought she would spend the rest of her life. Yet even she, in her moment of pure, idiotic vulnerability, never should have been placed in the hands of someone who has been accused of abuse by Fox. No one, even those desperate for matrimony, needs to be abused.

Granted, people can change over time. But there are some things that some people cannot change. The majority of the time, if you are dating someone who has abused someone previously, you, too, will be abused.

Fox deserves to be reprimanded for not letting Rockwell's history be known. They also should be ashamed that they let an idiotic show like this run.

Perhaps in the future Fox will run an update on the two people. Who knows what they will end up doing? But Fox will have to be creative since the movie title, "So I Married an Axe Murderer" already has been used.

Golden Rule goes platinum with consumerism in new millennium

What do Aggieville, the K-State Student Union and the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex all have in common?

These are places where people can come together to interact within a controlled social environment. We all know that people are, for the most part, social creatures and enjoy being around other people. However, with more than six billion people inhabiting the earth, it is impossible for any one person ever to meet and interact with all of them. As a result, this causes people to try to control their social environments and the people with whom they choose to associate. Unfortunately, the only way to do this is through the use of positive and negative stereotypes, which are a necessary evil developed throughout one's life and greatly influenced by one's moral upbringing.

That's right, one's moral upbringing is vital in determining what stereotypes are used, when they are used, where they are used and how they are used by a particular individual. The problem that quickly arises is not everyone is brought up and held to the same moral standard or made of the same moral fiber. This is why moral and ethical quandaries are so heavily debated and difficult to solve.

To avoid, or at least alleviate future difficulties, it is important that we ask ourselves what will be the greatest moral challenges of the new millennium? It could be the conversion of forests into neighborhoods or the rampant consumerism caused by Wall Street's bull market, the ramifications of easy worldwide travel or the murky promise and threat of the Internet, the murder of the unborn or the genetic engineering and cloning of more than just cattle, the pollution that causes global warming or world hunger due to overcrowding ... and so on and so on. All of these are worthy moral challenges, but they can be solved easily by solving one all-encompassing moral challenge.

This one all-encompassing moral challenge simply is the ignorance of the Golden Rule. For those of you who have forgotten, the Golden Rule says that one should "do unto others as you would have done unto you." Thanks to a booming economy and a society that is fixated on materialism, the Golden Rule has been replaced with a platinum one. The new "Platinum" Rule says, "The one with the most toys wins." As a result, many people are living well beyond their means and accumulating items that they do not need with little regard for the resources that they are wasting — if you ever have been to Johnson County, Kan., you are well aware of what I mean.

Now that our society has the ability to do everything under the sun, it also has lost sight of what it should do by focusing on what it can do. Instead of asking ourselves, "Should I buy another James Bond movie, taking my total to 14?" we simply look in our wallets, purses or checkbooks to see if we can. This strange lack of reality reflects a general lack of respect for human beings, our planet and for life in general.

If this Platinum Rule mentality is allowed to continue unabated and unchecked, it has the potential — with our help — to destroy every living thing on the face of the earth. Fortunately, we are not there yet and we still have time to realize that the world was not created solely for our own personal pleasure and that we all must coexist, nature included, on what the earth struggles to provide us. We no longer can afford to blindly forge ahead, over-consuming and polluting as though there is no next millennium, or we soon will go the way of the dodo.

Our planet only has a finite amount of space and resources, which must be used carefully if they are to last for generations to come. Whether we like it or not, this puts the awesome responsibility of careful planning and delegation of the earth's precious resources on the shoulders of our great society. To do so, we first must eliminate the Platinum Rule and then advocate the development of a mindset in which people do what they should in a way that they would want done unto them — a.k.a. the Golden Rule.

As we sit on the front porch of a new millennium patiently waiting to walk through the door in a few short months, we need to prepare ourselves and the rest of society for the moral and ethical challenges that await us on the other side. We must realize everyone does not have the same moral standards and that constantly bickering about them in the Campus Fourum is a complete waste of time.

Instead, we need to set aside our minor differences, bring back the spirit of the Golden Rule and as one planet, prepare to face the moral challenges ahead.

University prepared for high enrollment numbers

Editor,

I read with interest your Wednesday editorial titled, "K-State campus not ready for increased enrollments."

I appreciate your views on the issues outlined and would like to comment on a couple of points.

When legislation was passed in 1997 to allow universities to retain tuition generated from enrollment growth, it presented us with an opportunity to expand course offerings, in strategically slated areas, with qualified faculty to meet such growth. In a small number of programs, rapid growth can outstrip our ability to meet demand in any year. This happened in a couple instances this year.

Thanks to the cooperation and help of our faculty, in every instance we were aware of, arrangements were made to ensure graduation was not delayed for any student. We also have a mechanism in place to ensure that improvements will be made next fall in those areas that were affected this spring. In fact, each semester, the Enrollment Management Committee, led by Dean of Student Life Pat Bosco, meets to address the issue of course section needs of our students.

For the current semester, your observations about class offerings must be viewed in the context of a 1-percent mandated budget reduction that coincided with an increase of 490 students this spring. We now are optimistic that these funds will be restored for next year.

Prior to this budget reduction, the number of course sections offered in all academic areas rose from 3,274 in fall 1997 to 3,395 in fall 1998, and we estimate the number was 3,440 in fall 1999.

In closing, I also would note that a good deal of progress is being made toward a workable strategy to address parking. It should be emphasized that our student leadership has been a positive force in generating good ideas regarding this issue. As the history of K-State illustrates, it is the combined efforts of students, faculty and staff that serve as the foundation of our achievements.

Thank you for your concerns. I assure you that maintaining the quality of our educational mission always will be our first priority.

Missouri basketball fans show poor sportsmanship

Editor,

In regards to Melanie Ward's assertion that K-State fans are generally rude, classless, un-supportive and otherwise, I decided to watch the Missouri game on television as it took on Oklahoma State at home in Columbia.

Hoping to learn a lesson in fan behavior, I witnessed its fans throw objects onto the court several times, enough to earn Missouri a technical foul and end any comeback the Tigers might have had.

Obviously, the Missouri fans have nothing to teach us about proper fan behavior.

Pepsi holds monopoly on campus; prices too high

Editor,

I believe we at K-State need to stand against Pepsi Cola and its monopoly on campus.

When President Jon Wefald secured scholarships, I don't believe he expected the students to pay for them a nickel or dime at a time.

Any off-campus convenience store sells Pepsi and Coca-Cola fountain products at significantly lower prices than on campus. The unexpected price hike should not be accepted. We need to stop buying overpriced products, or costs will continue to rise.

I am surprised the student body president has failed to address this issue. I only can hope the presidential candidates make this an issue and unite the campus.

Bible translation creates questions about validity

Editor,

This is in response to Alicia Goheen's column, "Understanding comes from clear light of Bible's teachings."

First off, there is no absolute truth. Even if God did guide those who originally scribed the works that have become part of the Bible, did he also guide the hands and minds of those who translated and transcribed it into Latin before the Bible formally was created in the 12th century A.D.?

Did he also guide the millions who have been involved in translating it into all the many languages in which it appears today?

I personally find it doubtful that it possibly could be without error when there are a dozen English translations that don't seem to agree with each other.

Trust the deciding factor in choosing candidates

Editor,

Ah, if only things were as simple as Katie Sutton made them out to be in her column Monday.

Sutton only can wish that all criticism of the current administration stems from the fact that President Clinton "smoked a little weed when he was younger." Please don't tell me she actually believes this.

The truth is, people have legitimate disagreements and distaste for the Clinton administration based on real issues and principles, such as the historic tax increase in the 1993 budget or the botched attempt to socialize the entire health-care industry.

Similarly, are we not allowed to be outraged when a sitting president is kept in contempt by a federal judge for lying under oath, or when a vice president accepts donations from numerous foreign contributors, which is — by definition — illegal?

Or are these simply more moral issues, as petty and insignificant as allegations of marijuana use 30 years earlier? Hardly.

You see, a candidate's ethics and honesty become paramount when he or she is campaigning for your vote with proposal upon proposal, promise after promise.

As for Sutton's silly "Candidate A, B and C" quiz, we fortunately have real reporters who throw us more than two or three little factoids about our candidates — not to mention political debates and enough soft money flowing in to allow candidates to purchase their own advertising time, thus preventing themselves from being defined too narrowly.

Sutton likes to insist that behavior and character are irrelevant in a political campaign, but when it becomes impossible to trust a candidate, the things he or she says about the issues are what become irrelevant.

Pop, movie cost editorial unimportant to readers

Editor,

I am writing regarding Thursday's editorial whining about the effect of increased prices for soft drinks and movies.

Don't you have more important things to worry about? Do you realize how incredibly petty these issues are?

Don't you imagine that the vast majority of the people in the world — or even in Manhattan — would laugh at this viewpoint?

If this is really a big problem, there are two easy solutions.

Drink water.
Read a book — maybe even a textbook.

Dog Training Club gives recognition to member

Editor,

I was thrilled to see the Heartland Dog Training Club's agility event on the front page of Monday's Collegian.

The photo of John Hortin with Amber truly captured the kind of relationship we encourage in all our handlers. I would however, like to point out that I was not the sole organizer of this event.

Considerable credit must go to Cheryl May, who decided which sequences would be taught, developed and distributed flyers, accepted the registrations, assigned trainers to various tasks, answered a deluge of questions and spent hours on the phone to make the workshop happen. She also instructed on both days.

As Heartland's training director, I was one of many trainers who gave up a weekend to help pet owners learn new agility skills at our workshop. It is club members such as Cheryl, without whose dedication and tireless efforts this workshop and Heartland Dog Training Club would not exist, who deserve recognition.

Reader urges tolerance for Jeff Elliott's column

Editor,

I really am disturbed by the recurring theme I see in the letters to the editor and in Karrie Mitchell's guest viewpoint.

The original viewpoint by Jeff Elliott concerning Fred Phelps' group from Topeka did not express hatred toward gays.

Elliott took a chance and opened himself to ridicule when he expressed his religious beliefs. This is where the problem starts. His religious beliefs, clearly labeled an opinion on the opinion page, then are attacked as hateful.

Today's definition of tolerance has become one of, "I can do anything I want, and you have to accept it." But let a Christian express an opinion based on our faith, and we are labeled hateful. In other words, those Christians better accept us, or else, but we do not accept them.

Just because we are Christians, our opinions are unwanted and — because you don't like it — not valid. If you want me to accept your viewpoint, then it's unfair not to accept mine. If all viewpoints are valid, then mine is, too. To use an old saying, practice what you preach. Don't resort to name calling. Accept that not everyone agrees with you. I understand how frustrating that is, but that's the way it is.

Calling someone hateful because they have a different opinion is childish, unproductive and — to use the buzzword — intolerant.

Three ways to beat the high cost of college.

1. The Montgomery GI Bill
2. Student loan repayment
3. Part-time income

The Army Reserve Alternate Training Program is a smart way to pay for college.

First, if you qualify, the Montgomery GI Bill can provide you with over $7,000 for current college expenses or approved vo/tech training.

Second, if you have—or obtain—a qualified student loan not in default, you may get it paid off at the rate of 15% per year or $1,500, whichever is greater, up to a maximum of $10,000. Selected military skills can double that maximum.

Third, you can earn part-time money in college, and here's how it works: One summer you take Basic Training, and the next summer you receive skill training at an Army school. You'll earn over $1,600 for Basic and even more for skill training. Then you'll attend monthly meetings at an Army Reserve unit near your college, usually one weekend a month plus two weeks a year. You'll be paid over $107 a weekend to start. It's worth thinking about. Give us a call: 539-7243

Cats to face Red Raiders Saturday

■ Men's basketball team travels to Texas hoping to capitalize on Wednesday's win.

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's back to the road for the K-State Wildcats. The Cats are set to face the Texas Tech Red Raiders on Saturday in Lubbock, Texas.

For K-State (9-15, 2-11), it's as if a whole new season is starting after ending an 11-game losing streak with an 81-76 victory Wednesday night over the Texas A&M Aggies.

The win, though it is just K-State's second Big 12 Conference triumph, has eased some worries within the team.

"It gave us some confidence going into the next game," senior forward Tony Kitt said. "Road games are hard enough, just being at another team's place and trying to play. But when we take into consideration the streak that we just had, and we finally get a game won, that's got to give every single person on our team a boost of confidence."

For K-State head coach Tom Asbury, the victory was well overdue, considering all the speculations concerning his future at K-State.

"It probably hasn't even sunk in yet," Asbury said. "It's nice to win, clearly."

The Red Raiders (11-13, 2-11) bring a plethora of talent into the match-up. In fact, Tech has four players who average double figures in scoring.

Leading the way for Tech are 6-foot-11-inch sophomore center Andy Ellis, who averages nearly 17 points and nine rebounds per game. Also pacing the Red Raiders this season is senior guard Rayford Young with 16.4 points, senior forward Mario Layne with 13.8 points and senior forward James Ware with 11.4 points.

Tech has the same conference record as the Cats this season as the Red Raiders experienced a losing streak of their own. From Jan. 15 to Feb. 9, Tech lost eight straight games.

For Tech, it's a different story, coming off a 93-65 loss to Oklahoma on Wednesday night, compared to the Cats, who had much success against the Aggies.

Senior guard Cortez Groves had a career night with 30 points, eight three-pointers and six assists. On the season, Groves averages 16 points per game. The other lone Cat to K-State's weekend series against Texas A&M beginning at 3 p.m. today could be just the cure the Wildcats need.

Unfortunately for the Cats, it also could be the cure for the Aggies' ills.

K-State (2-4) has struggled from the mound all season, sporting a team ERA of 10.76. Texas A&M (5-7), on the other hand, hasn't been able to hit consistently. The Aggies have mustered more than 10 hits in a game in only four of 12 games, while their batting average of .265 places them ninth in the Big 12 Conference.

Facing a Big 12 team this early in the season is something that neither K-State head coach Mike Clark nor Texas A&M head coach Mark Johnson wants.

"I don't think anybody is ready to play a conference game this early in the season, but we have to," Clark said. "Talking to Coach Johnson — they lost to Sam Houston yesterday 2-1, and he was moaning and groaning, and I'm moaning and groaning back to him."

"Pros have a month of spring training — we get two weeks," Clark said. "It's just not enough time for quality baseball, but it's time to play, so we play."

K-State will start senior Jason Wells (0-1), 14.14 ERA, today; sophomore Luke Robertson (1-1), 9.72 ERA, Saturday and freshman Derek Ver Helst (0-1), 4.50 ERA, Sunday.

The two teams share a common opponent this season in Washington State. K-State beat the Cougars 9-7, while the Aggies dropped two to Washington State by scores of 5-3 and 14-4.

"I think we can just look at that going into this weekend and know that we definitely belong with Texas A&M and that we can play with Texas A&M," Wells said.

The Cats have lost eight straight games to the Aggies, with their last win coming in 1997.

With the exception of Wednesday's 7-1 loss to Creighton, K-State has been doing well from the plate, led by third baseman Josh Cavender.

The junior is 10 for 16 in his past four games and is second on the team in total bases with 10.

"Offensively, we've been swinging the bats well," Clark said. "We've been doing a real good job offensively."

JUSTIN HAYWORTH/COLLEGIAN

At 6-foot-6-inches, Olga Firsova has found her niche blocking shots for the Wildcats. Firsova, a native of Kiev, Ukraine, is a senior center and has set the K-State record for blocked shots in a career with 98.

BLOCKING MACHINE

BY MICHAEL NOLL

Senior center focuses on having fun when playing basketball for Cats

Olga Firsova's motto is simple: Have fun when playing basketball.

The women's basketball senior center has had no problems following that credo. Firsova, at 6 feet 6 inches, has found a niche blocking shots for the Cats and enjoys every minute of it.

"I'm playing because it's fun," Firsova said. "I don't want to be all stressed on the floor."

While the Kiev, Ukraine, native might not be stressed out, she has caused plenty of frustration for opposing players who have dared attempt a shot in the lane. Firsova already has set the school record for blocks with 98, the single-game record with seven against Colorado last Wednesday, and so far this season, Firsova has forced opponents to eat 48 of their own shots.

Of all her games, though, the Colorado contest really demonstrated Firsova's potential, head coach Deb Patterson said.

"The last 7 1/2 minutes against Colorado, Olga took over that game inside," Patterson said. "She was a block machine."

As a result, returning opponents' shots has become the swatting center's favorite activity, Firsova said.

"I enjoy doing it," Firsova said. "It gets them frustrated, makes them mad. Then they want to push me around and get a foul."

Firsova sometimes seems to enjoy blocking shots so much that when the chance is taken away, the culprit is liable to hear about it. In K-State's last game, against Oklahoma, Firsova made a block on an Oklahoma player, but was called for a foul and, consequently, vented some frustration toward the official.

The block against Oklahoma would have been nice to get, Firsova said, but she didn't criticize the officiating.

Cats battle Huskers in hopes of avenging midseason loss

By MICHAEL NOLL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When the K-State women's basketball team faces Nebraska in Lincoln on Saturday, the Cats will look to avenge a midseason loss to the Huskers.

The last time K-State (12-15, 5-9) faced Nebraska (14-11, 8-6), the Cats were in the throes of a three-game losing streak. Now, after playing conference-leading Oklahoma to the final minutes, the Cats feel more prepared for the Huskers, head coach Deb Patterson said.

"We showed signs of being extremely competitive against Oklahoma," Patterson said. "As frustrating as it was not playing well enough to get the victory, I think we understand the challenge will be great in Lincoln, but we're up to it."

In order to leave Lincoln with a road victory, the Cats will have to handle Nebraska's extremely physical press at least as well as they did in the previous meeting of the two teams, senior center Olga Firsova said.

"They are the most physical team I've seen in the conference," Firsova said. "But the first game I thought we handled the press very well."

While K-State was able to handle the Huskers' press relatively well, they did struggle to stop senior guard Nicole Kubik, who scored 26 points in Manhattan. To win on the road, the Cats will have to stop Kubik, Firsova said.

"The thing that we need to improve is defensively," Firsova said. "We need to know where their leader is, like Kubik. She got in a rhythm. We need to maintain the players that get in a rhythm and know where they are and defend them and contest their shots."

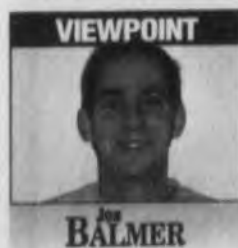

Tipoff for the game is scheduled for 7:05 p.m.

'Modern-day chariot race' wins fans over despite earlier feelings of disrespect

Jon BALMER

I have a confession to make.

No, I wasn't the one responsible for finally ushering Willie Wilson into the Royals' Hall of Fame. And no, I can't claim responsibility for Carlos Santana suddenly becoming the epicenter of pop music after years in the business. (Forget that Matchbox 20 guy. The real question is, when's Santana's duet with the Ol' Dirty Bastard scheduled for? I smell platinum.)

Truth is, I've been harboring some ill will toward NASCAR for some time. I used to consider it mindless drivel for the commoner and one small step above motocross (it made Vanilla Ice a star, you know) and Roller Jam.

All that changed recently, and I'm willing to admit I was wrong.

The change wasn't instantaneous. A conversation with a buddy who races on the independent circuit planted the seeds back in December. "Sportcenter" clips continued to tweak my curiosity. Finally, though, it all came together last weekend with The Great American Race, The Daytona 500.

Casual observation quickly turned into full submersion in the modern-day chariot race. Everything became intriguing: the art of a 10-second pit stop, the drafting of another driver.

Heck, they could have continued around the same track for another 500 miles, and I would have found something interesting. I was diggin' it like a madman.

NASCAR might never capture my eye like college football or Stanley Cup hockey, but I can't claim that it's akin to "Smokey & the Bandit" anymore. Whether it's a sport is another question. No disrespect intended, but auto racing has become more of a science in recent years.

Pit crews have been matched by technology crews by some racing teams. Ray Evernham, Jeff Gordon's former crew chief and the mastermind behind the most marketable man in NASCAR's Winston Cup championship two years ago, popularized the two-crew system. Computer engineers on the race track seem to be the next logical step. Dale Jarrett's win at Daytona 2000 had just as much to do with his driving prowess as his crew's computer smarts and ingenuity. Some would argue more so.

Still, most fans don't fall in love with certain racing teams because of their driver's personality. They take to Dale Earnhardt because of his grit and by-any-means-necessary attitude that earned him the nickname "The Intimidator." They buy into Jeff Gordon's "Rainbow Warrior" team because of Gordon's technical skill on the track. They take to Rusty Wallace, because, well, maybe because of those great Miller Time ads, I don't know.

I still haven't found a driver to identify with yet. Lord knows if I ever will. But I have shed my NASCAR bigotry. Whether I decide to label my car with a plethora of sponsors and decals is another question.

STEPPING UP

Wildcat track, field team members must fill multiple roles in meet

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State track and field program looks to take its performance up a level this week at the Big 12 Track and Field Indoor Championships at Iowa State.

Assistant track and field coach Randy Cole said the team will be asking its athletes to step in and fill some roles during the competition.

"Yeah, we are going to be asking people to step it up and also maybe take on a pretty good load and maybe double an event — either a relay or track event and a field event," Cole said. "Maybe run a couple different races — we are going to have to load up and step up to do every thing we can."

The meet will be judged on both a team and individual level. Last season, the Cats finished fourth on the women's side and fifth on the men's side.

In the four years of the meet's existence,

STEVEN DEARINGER/COLLEGIAN

K-State's Josef Karas lands in the sand pit during a heptathlon competition at a home meet in Ahearn Field House earlier this year. The track team competes in Ames, Iowa, today in the Big 12 Indoor Track & Field Championships.

K-State also has fared well individually. This season, the Cats have won 72 medals in 11 meets.

As a team, the K-State women are ranked No. 9 by Trackwire Publications track and field poll. The Cats are tied with Stanford heading into the weekend — a weekend when K-State athletes will be looking to set their best marks in hopes of qualifying for nationals.

The team has been taking back its workloads in practice.

"We've taken off the training load just a little bit, and we are refining techniques,"

Cole said.

The distance runners, Cole said, were kept out of the KSU Open last week, allowing them to rest up for Big 12 Championship, which goes far in determining who will be going to nationals.

"Sometimes running an emotional race and then having to come back and do that again, that might have been a little too much," Cole said. "They're probably going to feel better getting some good workouts in."

Now, with a week off, rest and light work, the Cats begin their push toward the end at 9:20 a.m. today.

family and friends, but we'll just have to wait a little bit. I don't know when, but a little longer."

In typical Firsova fashion, however, she found many positives in her absence from home this summer, the best of which was representing the team as an ambassador, Firsova said.

"It was probably the best thing I've ever done," Firsova said. "It was just so exciting. I enjoyed it so much, meeting so many people and just interacting with them. It was nice."

Not only did Firsova enjoy the ambassadorship, but she also represented K-State well, Patterson said.

"She was a real charmer," Patterson said. "She just showed that softer side of herself and that humorous side of herself."

When the senior center does return home, she will face a reception much different than players from the United States might face. American college athletes often receive adoration from their hometowns, but Firsova probably will avoid her high school coaches, she said.

"Coaches are usually so mad at me that they might not even talk about me," Firsova said. "They wanted me to stay there and try and play professional, but in Ukraine there's no good competition. It's just not a good environment for basketball right now."

So, instead of contemplating playing basketball back home in the Ukraine, Firsova is now just concerned with finishing out the rest of her senior season well. Particularly exciting is the prospect of playing in the Big 12 Tournament, Firsova said.

"It's very exciting," Firsova said. "I think everybody wants to go there and make some noise, and I think we can."

And if Firsova is involved, the sound produced most likely will be a joyful one.

average double figures in scoring is Kitt with 13.5 points per game, while adding 9.3 rebounds per contest.

Against A&M, Kitt and Groves combined to score 51 points between them, and as a team, K-State shot nearly 57 percent from the field — all of which Kitt said is a significant accomplishment going on the road again. K-State has just one conference road win in the last two seasons.

"It just reassured us that we are a good team, and that we are capable of doing some good things," Kitt said. "I always think that it's going to get worse before it gets better. I think we were at that point to where everybody was as bad as they could get."

"We came out and showed some toughness, and going into these next two games, we'll go in there with some confidence and try to pull them out."

Consortium allows study at other schools

■ Students can enroll in other college, still keep financial aid at K-State.

By JENNIFER RYAN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students don't have to sacrifice their K-State financial aid to take a semester of classes at another college.

Two schools can make an agreement called a consortium.

"Consortium agreements allow students to complete courses which cannot be completed through K-State, such as students on internships," said Jack Taylor, assistant director of financial aid.

Students can participate in a consortium only one semester per academic year. The classes also must be transferable to K-State and applicable to the student's program of study, Taylor said.

"Consortium students are bound by the degree requirements just like any other student," Taylor said. "No consortium agreement is approved until the academic adviser confirms that the courses will meet the degree requirements.

"By limiting the consortium agreements to one per academic year and seeking degree fulfillment confirmation from advisers, a level of integrity for the degrees remains high and intact."

Annette Sweet, senior in print journalism, said signing up for a consortium with Highland Community College in Wamego helped her get the classes she needs to graduate.

"The classes were smaller, and that made them seem easier to handle."

"It wasn't complicated at all. I went to Fairchild, and they just gave me a sheet that explained the consortium and what I needed to do," Sweet said.

The consortium with K-State is not difficult for the other college in the arrangement, either, said Frank Gose, director of the Wamego Center of HCCC.

"We are delighted with anything that helps students and we appreciate K-State's agreement with us. This is saying our classes are accepted for credit at K-State," Gose said. "I think it benefits the students, K-State and Highland."

"From our end, we don't really have much to do with the paperwork and that's one of the reasons it's such a great opportunity. All the student has to do is show proof of credit from Highland to K-State."

Taylor said that when applying for a consortium, students should be aware of the agreement's limits.

"Some students expecting to complete a full year through consortium, and their credit hours weren't coming into K-State in a timely fashion," he said.

"Students need to be aware of the degree requirements. If the credit hours do not transfer prior to the next semester, the student could face an academic progress problem."

Opponents of bill designed to block living wage stage rally at Statehouse in Topeka

By TIM RICHARDSON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Opponents of a bill that would prohibit cities and counties from establishing their own minimum wages rallied Thursday at the Statehouse.

The Coalition of Workers Rights, Social Justice and Economic Fairness also lobbied legislators. The coalition wants the state to increase its minimum wage and allow communities to establish higher living wages.

The rally attracted about 200 people, many of them members of labor unions.

Ron Eldridge, president of the Kansas AFL-CIO, said the bill favors business over working families. He said all Kansas families should receive a wage that pays for clothing, health care and other necessities.

"It's all about wealth," Eldridge said. "They don't want to share with the working men and women what they deserve."

Living wages have become a legislative issue because of efforts in Manhattan, where the Flint Hills

Living Wage Coalition has lobbied city commissioners to take wages into consideration when bringing businesses to the city.

The coalition wants firms receiving economic development funds from the city to pay workers $8.45 an hour if they provide health insurance coverage and $9.28 if they do not. The federal minimum wage is $5.15 an hour.

Opponents of the bill to prevent such ordinances argue that state government should not interfere with communities looking to establish a minimum wage.

Sara Lawson, of Speak United in Manhattan, said a living wage would help single mothers and working families.

"I think it shows that the community is looking out for its people and it cares about businesses in the community," Lawson said.

The Senate originally planned to debate the living-wage bill this week, but members planned to propose so many amendments that its Republican leaders postponed it at least a week.

Senate President Dick Bond, R-Overland Park, said a city should not be prohibited from establishing a living wage if a firm receives financial incentives from the city, and wages are part of the contract.

In other cases, he said, "To have a different minimum wage from city to city is just very bad policy and very confusing."

The bill began as a Democratic proposal to increase the state's minimum wage from $2.65 to $5.15 an hour.

Republicans on the Senate Commerce Committee added the provisions to prohibit local minimum or living wages.

The Department of Human Resources estimates that about 26,000 Kansas workers, or about 2 percent, earn less than $5.15 an hour. Only Wyoming has a lower state minimum wage than Kansas.

Bond said the effect of changing the state's minimum wage would be more symbolic than practical because of the small number of people earning the wage.

House Minority Leader Jim Garner, D-Coffeyville, said working families should be guaranteed good jobs, quality schools and a secure retirement.

Country band playing Longhorn's tonight

Story by Chelsea Schmidt

The Great Divide will play a few weeks early at Manhattan.

The country band said it has performed at several of the St. Patrick's Day celebrations and Country Stampede, so Manhattan residents should be familiar with its sound. The concert is scheduled for 7 tonight at Longhorn's.

"We used to go up there on St. Patrick's Day for the race and party afterward," said J.J. Lester, drummer for The Great Divide. "We've also had the opportunity to play at the Country Stampede a couple of times, so we've gotten quite a bit of exposure."

The members, of the Oklahoma-based band said they are excited to perform in Manhattan because they have close ties with the college atmosphere.

"It's a neat place," Lester said. "We really like it up there. K-State is a lot like Oklahoma State. We cut our teeth in college bars. It's a market we always like to get into."

The Great Divide was invited to perform after its successful performance in September, said Toby Church, manager at Longhorn's.

"They've been here before, so we're just welcoming them back," Church said. "We're just trying to bring in bands that are up and coming that students would like."

Lester said he anticipates a good show. "We've been deemed a 'party band,'" Lester said. "We like to have a good time and for the other people to have a good time."

The Great Divide is between labels, but recently has released an independent compact disc, "The Great Divide and Friends: Dirt & Spirit," available through Internet sites.

"It is an acoustic, gospel album, chock full of local and regional talent around our area," Lester said. "We always respected and enjoyed being around these performers."

Lester also said there is spiritual influence behind the album.

He said the group is known as a country band but enjoys performing music with a religious feel.

"We're not perfect Christians, but we believe that Jesus is the son of God and died for our sins," he said.

The Great Divide is working on recording its newest CD, which should be available in mid-spring or early summer, Lester said.

Lester said the variety of its music is evident and is due to the number of influences each member had growing up.

"I grew up in the '80s listening to everything from Chris LeDoux to Van Halen, and I also like older music played on the eight-tracks," Lester said. "As far as songwriting, I'm a big fan of Van Morrison, (Bruce) Springsteen, (John) Mellencamp, Willie Nelson, and I even listen to classical music."

Lester said he is not particularly fond of the way country music is being presented today.

"Country music is on the brink of something different," he said. "It's going pop, which is sad to me. There are labels shutting down in Nashville, which are a clear reflection that you can only pound look-alike acts so long until Joe Public is going to say, 'I'm sick of that.'"

Lester said he hopes country music will go back to being concerned with the quality of the music, rather than the money.

The Great Divide, comprised of J.J. Lester (drums), Scotte Lester (rhythm guitar), Kelley Green (bass guitar) and Mike McClure (lead guitar), has come a long way since the band began playing together, J.J. Lester said.

"We never really anticipated doing a lot of shows," he said. "Our goal was to get original songs published and have big artists record them."

J.J. Lester said he is excited to perform at Longhorn's.

"I love to perform and enjoy playing the drums," he said. "There's nothing more rewarding than when people enjoy what you do. I like to meet people and when you get done making a record or having a good show, there is no better feeling."

Jenna Weisbender, freshman in open-option, said she thinks The Great Divide will put on an entertaining show.

"I enjoy going dancing at Longhorn's, and to have a band come in makes it even more entertaining," Weisbender said.

The concert is at 7 tonight at Longhorn's. Tickets are $8 (includes cover charge).

Local production of 'Private Lives' opens tonight

By NATALIA FARMER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Manhattan Arts Center community theater will celebrate the centennial of the comedy writer Noel Coward by presenting "Private Lives," the play that made Coward the highest-paid author in the English-speaking world of 1930.

"Private Lives" will be performed at 8 p.m. today-Sunday and March 2-5 at the arts center. The show also will be performed at 2 p.m. as a Sunday matinee.

The show centers on divorced English couples who meet again when honeymooning in France with their second spouses. The story takes many unexpected and amusing twists and turns, director Davis Smit said.

Smit said he previously has worked on three performances for the theater, and "Private Lives" is the kind of performance open to everybody.

"I only pick plays that I like," he said. "This is a classic comedy that's very witty and articulate, but at the same time funny enough that anyone can watch and enjoy it."

Producer Penny Senften said she loves the play and thinks the performers have done a good job adopting an English accent for their characters.

"Being British — I love it," she said. "The events that take place are hilarious and funny to witness. It was originally produced in 1930, but we have done a timeless set in the recent past."

Coward, known for his famous comedies and melodies, also was an actor, playwright, composer and lyricist. Ben Hanne, stage manager, said they have incorporated a pianist and singer during the performance to bring attention to Coward's greatest songs. They include "Mad About the Boy," "Room with a View," "Someday I'll Find You" and "I'll see You Again."

"I like any Noel Coward play. I love the humor, which is very highbrow than most comedies," Hanne said. "All his shows are of excellent quality. I really respect his plays."

Alissa Duncan, who plays Amanda, said this will be her first performance for the theater and that it has been an enjoyable experience so far. She said she looks forward to being cast in future roles.

"It's a comedy of morals and feelings. I've loved playing Amanda because her personality has been so easy," she said. "She is the type of character with no morals. Many people may see her as a devil character, but her inner-self is deeper than many think."

After tonight's performance, there will be a reception providing the audience a chance to meet the cast and crew.

Ticket prices are $9 for adults, $7 for students and $4 for children. They are available by calling 539-6000 or at the Manhattan Arts Center or Streetside Records.

The matchup with the Oklahoma Sooners could prove to be interesting, considering four former K-State assistant coaches now are walking the sidelines in Norman.

K-State retains conference opponents Colorado, Nebraska, Missouri, Kansas and Iowa State.

Colorado, Texas A&M, Nebraska and Oklahoma all played in postseason bowl games in 1999.

K-State fans can get their first looks at the 2000 Cats in the annual spring game April 29. Kickoff is slated for 1 p.m.

made no eye contact with the victim's family but smiled at her attorney and a spiritual adviser watching through a window at her side. She continued smiling as she slipped into unconsciousness.

Death penalty opponents and domestic violence organizations had urged Bush to grant Beets a 30-day delay, arguing it would be consistent with his description of himself as a "compassionate conservative" in his presidential campaign. The delay was Bush's only option, since the state parole board did not recommend that her sentence be commuted to life in prison.

During his 5 1/2 years as governor, 120 convicted killers have been executed in Texas. He has spared one condemned inmate.

"After careful review of the evidence of the case, I concur with the jury that Betty Lou Beets is guilty of this murder," Bush said in a written statement after returning to Texas from California, where he was campaigning for the Republican nomination.

"I'm confident that the courts, both state and federal, have thoroughly reviewed all the issues raised by the defendant."

Prosecutors said Beets shot and killed two of her husbands, but she was tried only in the death of her fifth husband, Dallas Fire Captain Jimmy Don Beets, nearly 17 years ago. Prosecutors said she killed him to collect his life insurance and pension.

Beets and her lawyers insisted the former bartender-waitress was the victim of years of domestic abuse and should be allowed to live.

On Thursday, the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans rejected an appeal that accused the state of not following its own rules in reviewing Beets' case. The arguments were dismissed Wednesday by a federal judge in Austin as a delay tactic.

Beets' lawyers also took the matter to the U.S. Supreme Court, which rejected it without comment.

According to the governor's office, Bush had received 2,108 phone calls and letters opposing Beets' execution by Thursday afternoon, and 57 favoring it.

"A decision to stay the execution of Ms. Beets would demonstrate your compassionate conservatism and that you are willing to do what is right even in the face of potential criticism from your constituents," the Rev. Jesse Jackson wrote Bush on Thursday.

Steven Hawkins, executive director of the National Coalition to Abolish the Death Penalty, implored Bush to grant a reprieve "so evidence of her being battered ... may be fully evaluated."

"Far from receiving careful consideration, the role of domestic abuse in Betty's crime has been continually swept under the rug by the Texas court system," Hawkins said.

Her claims of domestic abuse surfaced only recently and were not a factor in her 1985 trial, although one of her daughters, Faye Lane, in a tearful plea for her mother's life, said this week her mother was acting in self-defense after years of abuse.

Betty Lou Beets also was convicted of shooting and wounding her second husband, Bill Lane.

PRICES

and Natural Resources Committee.

While heating oil prices are beginning to ease, the Energy Department said similar price spikes could flare in the summer, a heavy driving time, and the American Automobile Association warned of possible short supplies then.

Many motorists are paying nearly $1.50 a gallon and even $2 for regular gasoline, according to various studies. The national average this week was $1.41, a nickel higher than the week earlier.

"We will likely see even higher prices this spring," said John Cook, petroleum director at the Energy Information Administration.

Cook said low inventories of crude oil and heating and diesel stocks, combined with soaring prices, led to the extremely sharp, sudden price increases in heating oil late January and early February.

The low inventories and a reluctance by refiners to buy crude at high prices set the stage for the price of heating oil to double in parts of the Northeast when the weather suddenly turned cold.

A similar scenario seems to be developing on the gasoline front that could lead to severe price increases, especially if there is great demand, energy experts said.

Both gasoline and petroleum stocks are low, said Cook, adding that refiners will have to increase gasoline production significantly to meet high summer demand.

With very little crude oil or gasoline in inventory, refiners will be purchasing crude oil in a market short on supplies, and that means higher prices, he said.

As of this week, gasoline stocks stood at 197 million barrels, compared with 229 million barrels a year ago, according to the Energy Department. Crude oil stocks were at 286 million barrels, 50 million fewer barrels than a year ago and well below historic levels for this time of year.

With gasoline stocks at a 20-year low, "unless something is done ... supply could be threatened," Susan Pikralidis, an AAA vice president, wrote Energy Secretary Bill Richardson.

Judge orders Meneley to step down as Shawnee County sheriff

By DAVID MILES
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Two judges ordered Shawnee County Sheriff Dave Meneley to turn in his badge and gun Thursday, but his attorney planned an appeal, saying Meneley was the victim of a vicious political witch hunt.

The judges ordered Meneley's removal from office after concluding that he had given false testimony in two instances and concealed from investigators the disappearance of drug evidence.

The Shawnee County Commission then fired the No. 2 officer in Meneley's department, Undersheriff William Huffmier, because he was appointed by Meneley, commissioner Mike Meier said.

Left in charge, at least temporarily, was Capt. Dan Bryant.

"It's been a hectic day, to say the least," Bryant said.

GOP precinct committee members in Shawnee County said they plan to choose a replacement to serve out the remaining 10 months of the Republican's term. The new sheriff would be appointed by Gov. Bill Graves.

The 54-year-old ex-sheriff was intense, but he wasn't angry, lawyer Margie Phelps said.

Phelps said she would ask the state Court of Appeals to overturn the judges' ruling.

She said voters should expect Meneley, who has served nearly two terms, to run for re-election. She said the ruling only covered what would have been the remainder of Meneley's term.

"No comment," said Meneley's wife, Sandy, who answered the phone at the family home Thursday.

Attorney General Carla Stovall released a statement: "While I am not celebrating, I am pleased that justice has been served."

Shawnee County District Judges Matthew Dowd and Richard Anderson removed Meneley over three counts contained in a civil ouster petition filed by Stovall in May. Stovall alleged 13 counts of willful misconduct in office or violations of moral turpitude.

"The court found no hesitancy in concluding that based upon the demonstrated willful misconduct of Sheriff David Meneley that ouster is justified and necessary," the judges wrote in a summary of their order.

Two counts dealt with testimony Meneley gave about how much he knew about a former deputy's cocaine use.

Meneley consistently has maintained that he did not know about it until the deputy himself went public shortly before resigning almost a year ago.

That statement contradicts statements made by others.

One of the two counts cited by the judges alleged that Meneley committed perjury during a 1996 inquisition by Stovall's office. The other said he committed perjury during a 1999 hearing in which a drug defendant sought to have the charges against him dismissed.

The third count cited by the judges said Meneley concealed from investigators the deputy's theft of drug evidence. The count states Meneley concealed the information during a 1996 investigation by Stovall's office and the Kansas Bureau of Investigation.

"This was found to be so serious and detrimental to the public and the functioning of the criminal justice system that it warranted the ultimate and severe penalty of removal from office," the judges wrote of the three counts.

Stovall's ouster petition was not the only legal problem Meneley faced. Twenty-two criminal charges also have been filed against him.

Last month, Meneley was bound over for trial on two felony perjury charges filed against him by Shawnee County District Attorney Joan Hamilton.

Those charges relate to testimony Meneley gave under oath in the 1999 hearing in the drug case.

In addition, Stovall has filed another 20 charges against Meneley, alleging felony theft, misuse of public funds over the handling of money used by the department for undercover drug purchases, and personal use of campaign funds.

Dean search to include student help

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students in the College of Arts and Sciences are invited to help in the search for the college's newest assistant dean.

While a specially selected group of five K-State employees and one student has been assigned the task of interviewing candidates for the position, sessions are available to allow students a voice in hiring, said Steve White, associate dean of arts and sciences and member of the assistant dean search committee.

"Each candidate makes a presentation, which is open to faculty and students to attend," White said. "Anyone that wants to attend the question-and-answer session after the presentation has the opportunity."

With a student on the search committee, however, low student attendance at these meetings will not mean the absence of student opinion.

"We try to have a search committee of people knowledgeable about the position, with a balance of interest," White said.

Census needed to access KATS, vote in elections

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students must fill out the State of Kansas 2000 Census Adjustment Questionnaire to vote in the upcoming Student Governing Association elections and enroll for fall classes at K-State.

"The state of Kansas conducts its own census, and it is added to the federal census," said Scott Jones, assistant dean of student life. "Kansas is the only state I know of that conducts its own census."

Jones said it is a state mandate that K-State achieve 100-percent compliance, which means all students must fill out the census. If the university only went through the motions and did not make an effort to have all students fill out the census, Jones said action probably would be taken against K-State.

"We've been planning how to best implement this for three months now," Jones said.

The census became available to students on KATS today. Jones said it should take only about three minutes to fill out the survey, depending on how the student answers the seven residency questions.

These questions will not affect tuition, income tax rates or college mailing addresses, Jones said.

Students have been required in the past to fill out a census before they enroll. Jones said it has not been a requirement every year, but every few years K-State is mandated to make students fill out a census.

Before KATS was available, Jones said paper forms were handed to students before enrollment.

Jones said placing the survey on KATS provides an easier outlet for students. He said its 24 hour, seven day access, and the fact that the census will be available for one month, will make the process easier.

Because this state mandate does not come with any funding, Jones said direct mail poses a huge cost, as well as a low response rate. He said it would have cost more if K-State had mailed the census to students.

Jones sent K-State students an e-mail explaining that the census must be completed and submitted

3 Reasons to fill out the 2000 census

1 Help your community thrive. Census numbers can help your community work out public improvement strategies.

2 Get help in times of need. Many 911 emergency systems are based on maps developed for the last census. When floods, tornadoes or earthquakes hit, the census tells rescuers how many people will need their help.

3 Make the government work for you. It's a good way to tell our leaders who we are and what we need. The numbers are used to help determine the distribution of more than $100 billion in federal funds and even more in state funds.

Meeting to decide greek adviser's fate

By JOSEPH HURLA
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The future of K-State's top greek adviser is up in the air.

The Interfraternity and Panhellenic councils will conduct a meeting tonight to start talks that could determine the future of Barb Robel as the adviser for Greek Affairs at K-State.

"It is a forum between members of IFC, Panhellenic Council, chapter advisers and house corp-presidents," IFC president Mike Goodpasture said.

Goodpasture said the housing corporation presidents asked to have a meeting at which they would have an opportunity to express comments and concerns with K-State's greek system. At the top of their list, though, is Robel.

"That's the main reason," Goodpasture said. "They're certainly not just concerned with Barb. It's going to be about what they like and dislike about the fraternity and sorority systems."

Charlie Hostetler, housing corporation president for Sigma Alpha Epsilon, however, said the meeting would focus on Robel.

"There are numerous local alumni who are concerned with some of Mrs. Robel's decisions, and we want to discuss some necessary reforms to the greek system."

Robel said she had been informed of the meeting, and she plans to attend. She also said she was aware she was at the top of the meeting's agenda.

She said she did not know, however, what specific concerns might be addressed.

"It will be a small group of alumni who have concerns with Greek Affairs and about my position," Robel said. "All we have is hearsay. They've refused to put anything in writing."

Many of the alumni members who have brought forth complaints are housing corporation presidents for fraternity or sorority chapters. Goodpasture said the role of the presidents usually is limited, but those presidents are the leaders of groups that do more or less own their fraternity or sorority house.

Goodpasture said any decision on Robel's future would come from IFC and Panhellenic Council, not the alumni.

"They don't have any power to remove her," Goodpasture said.

"They're just voicing concerns."

Robel said the alumni only have the power to voice their complaints to IFC and Panhellenic Council. She said this was because of the interaction that IFC and Panhellenic Council have with her.

"IFC and Panhellenic officers are responsible to the undergraduate members, rather than the alumni members," she said. "The students who do the hiring and the evaluations would be in a better position to examine the performance of the adviser."

Robel said she is confident IFC and Panhellenic Council members are not going to the meeting with any preconceived biases against her.

"The students have expressed 100-percent support," Robel said. "I think they will listen objectively. We will all listen to their concerns and then respond to them."

Despite this support, Robel said the meeting was not being shrugged off.

"We take any sort of accusation seriously," she said. "We look forward to having an opportunity to respond to their concerns."

Several students expressed support for Robel and her job as adviser.

Mary Schwartz, Delta Delta Delta president and Panhellenic Council executive secretary, said Robel should be commended for the amount of leeway she allowed the students.

"I have nothing but positives to say about Barb," Schwartz said. "She is an outstanding adviser. She allows us to make our own decisions, but is there when we need her."

"She is someone who we can go to for help in formulating ideas. It's definitely a student-run organization."

Sara Tirrell, Pi Beta Phi president, said she agreed about the quality of Robel's work history.

"She does an incredible job," Tirrell said. "I can't understand why anyone would have a problem with her."

Mike McCree, an alumnus of Sigma Nu fraternity who will attend the meeting, said Robel traditionally has received positive reviews for her work.

He said evaluations done by IFC and Panhellenic Council members, which have always been good, have improved even further of late.

Valerie Wurtz, freshman in animal science and industry and pre-veterinary medicine, was crowned Miss Rodeo K-State on Saturday evening in Weber Arena. She will represent K-State and the rodeo program at various events during the next year.

rodeo QUEEN

K-State freshman ropes in crown, several prizes in competition

Along with the crown, Valerie Wurtz received a saddlebag, halter, belt buckle, roses, free tanning sessions and a gift certificate to a local dry cleaner.

Wurtz, freshman in animal science and industry and pre-veterinary medicine, made her first ride around Weber Arena as Miss Rodeo K-State on Saturday night.

A filled arena witnessed the crowning before the second night of the 44th annual K-State Intercollegiate Rodeo.

"I have always been interested in rodeo," Wurtz said. "This is a great way to meet new people and promote the sport."

Wurtz, from Riley, Kan., will represent K-State and the sport of rodeo at functions in and around Kansas. She will attend events such as rodeos and parades.

Wurtz received two plaques for winning the interview and public speaking events. She also won the modeling division and received a pair of earrings.

Julie Wurtz, her mother, said Wurtz has always had an interest in rodeo. Wurtz started showing her pony Western Pleasure at age 4 in the pony league.

When Wurtz's younger brothers started bull riding a few years ago, she picked up team penning.

"Her goal is to show that anybody can be in the rodeo. She enjoys working behind the chutes and grooming horses," Wurtz's mother said.

Shannon Burdick, junior in agricultural journalism, was named runner up. She received the congeniality award.

Lena (Ratliff) Hommertzhim was K-State Rodeo Queen in 1995 and graduated in 1997 in animal science and industry.

Hommertzhim, originally from Smith Center, Kan., said she learned a lot from the experience.

"I learned a lot about rodeo and became a better public speaker," she said. "Rodeo isn't just about the events, it's about kids. Getting them involved, entertaining kids and setting examples for little ones is what rodeo is all about."

Char Henton of Kansas median services and K-State research and extension has helped with the coronation since 1991.

"It is an honor, opportunity, but most importantly a responsibility," she said. "The position has its challenges. The queen has to inform and explain the events, not just the rodeo."

Death of Army commander spurs inquiry by military

INDEPENDENCE, Mo. — Military officials are investigating the death of the commander of the Lake City Army Ammunition plant. Lt. Col. Leslie B. Kaye, 40, was found dead Friday evening in his home at the plant, where he lived with his wife and infant son. No details on the cause of death have been released. Plant spokesman Bill Melton said authorities from Fort Leavenworth are investigating the death. A spokeswoman said the Army had no comment. "I had a lot of respect for Colonel Kaye," Melton said. "His death is a terrible tragedy."

Kaye was stationed at Patrick Air Force Base, Fla., last year when he was assigned to the command post at Lake City. He also had been an instructor at the Inter-Service Nuclear Weapons School at Kirtland Air Force Base, N.M.

Melton, who also was Kaye's civilian deputy, said the loss of the plant commander comes at a critical time for the plant, which has changed civilian contractors for the first time in more than a decade.

Alliant Techsystems last month took over management of the plant.

Olin Corp. had operated the plant since 1985, but last year military agencies replaced Olin with Minnesota-based Alliant.

In a lawsuit that seeks to overturn the bid awarded to Alliant, Olin has challenged the loss of the $1 billion-plus operating contract.

Lake City is the military's only small-arms bullet factory and employs about 1,000 civilian workers. The 3,900-acre complex is expected to produce 350 million rounds of ammunition this year.

Negotiations break down between Boeing, its union

SEATAC, Wash. — Talks between The Boeing Co. and its striking engineers union broke down late Saturday with sides still far apart on significant issues, a union spokesman said. No further talks were scheduled.

The stalemate came after three days of negotiations attended by C. Richard Barnes, the nation's top federal mediator. Barnes earlier had said he hoped a resolution could be reached over the weekend, but has since left.

The union, the 22,600-member Society of Professional Engineering Employees in Aerospace, went on strike Feb. 9 seeking more guaranteed pay raises and bonuses similar to those received by the larger Machinists union.

Boeing has insisted on mostly selective pay increases, reductions in life insurance benefits and some changes in health insurance.

The company made a third offer to the union on Saturday, but it was closer to the first offer made back in November, Craig Buckham, president of the aerospace union, said. Company spokesman Peter Conte called the proposal "good."

The aerospace giant has delivered only four airplanes so far this month. In February 1999, the company delivered 47 aircraft to customers.

Union spokesman Bill Dugovich said late Saturday workers are in it for the long haul with Boeing.

"If they want a long strike," he said, "that's what they'll receive."

Crude oil rates increase; gas prices set record high

LOS ANGELES — Gasoline rose 6 cents per gallon at the pump in the past two weeks, surpassing the all-time peak recorded in November 1990, industry analyst Trilby Lundberg said Sunday.

High crude oil prices and strong demand combined to drive up the national average price, including all grades and taxes, to $1.4713 as of Friday. That was an increase of 6.08 cents from Feb. 11, according to the Lundberg Survey of 10,000 stations nationwide.

"The international oil community is speculating that key world oil producers may increase oil production in April, which would ease oil prices and therefore gasoline prices," Lundberg said. "But for now, gasoline prices will probably hover around their current levels or rise even further."

Increasing financial aid and extending the proposed fall break are two of the issues Andrew Miller, sophomore in business administration and vice presidential candidate, and Chris Brooks, junior in business administration and presidential candidate, are promoting in their Student Governing Association campaign.

Brooks, Miller platform offers middle ground

By FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nine presidential candidates with nine different platforms have begun their pursuit of office, but Chris Brooks and Andrew Miller said their friendly, personable attitudes will help them during the election.

"Our personality and our integrity will put us over the top," Brooks said. "Hopefully, people will believe that we will get stuff done that realistically can be done."

Brooks, junior in business administration, and Miller, sophomore in business administration, said they plan to be a happy medium in an election that offers a variety of different platforms and personalities.

"Some are taking it seriously — others are at the opposite end making jokes," Brooks said. "We are definitely in the middle. We are politically inclined, but we're out to have fun and get to know people. We're just trying to talk with everybody to see what they need and want. We think we have good issues to deal with."

The presidential hopefuls kicked off their campaign last Monday, running under the slogan "We've got issues." They have focused their campaign on fall break and financial aid.

Brooks and Miller said they began thinking about a presidential campaign shortly after last year's elections but did not begin putting a plan into action until winter break, when the two discussed the Student Governing Association election process on the way to the Holiday Bowl.

"When we saw all the K-State fans supporting the university, we wanted to represent a university that displayed that kind of pride," Brooks said. "We were intrigued with SGA. We wanted to get involved in the system and give our opinion."

Brooks was elected last year as an active member of the Business Council and served on the council's financial committee, where he said he gained experience making final decisions on the department's budget.

Brooks said his experience and his familiarity with the Kansas Legislature make him well qualified for the presidency.

"I remember seeing how involved he gets," Miller said of his running mate. "He doesn't do anything half way. He goes all the way."

In addition to lobbying for a financial aid increase, they are pushing for an extended fall break.

Presidential candidates discuss tuition increases, financial aid

By FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The recent $3.20 per-credit-hour tuition increase at K-State has become a hot topic for student body presidential candidates.

Chris Brooks, junior in business administration, and Andrew Miller, sophomore in business administration, said they are concerned that the amount of financial aid a student receives will not increase along with the recent tuition hike.

If elected, they said they hope to change that.

"If the tuition is going to rise, I think there definitely needs to be a rise in financial aid," Brooks said. "Since we've been here, the tuition really hasn't risen so comparatively that it's not affordable, but if you're taking 15 to 20 hours, that's going to increase the amount you need to pay by quite a bit."

The Kansas Board of Regents approved the tuition increase Dec. 16. The hike, which will go into effect this fall, is the second in seven months. The board passed a 2.5 percent per-credit-hour increase last June.

Regents chairman Bill Docking said the relationship between financial aid and tuition is an important one that will be addressed in the future by a task force.

"Anytime we increase tuition, in the same paragraph, we have to be talking about increasing financial aid," Docking said.

Brooks said one option to increase the amount of aid available is to try to set up programs with alumni to free up extra money.

"We would be the representative of the student body to the state of Kansas," Brooks said. "The best we can do with the power that we have is take the students' word for what they want and lobby for it."

Jack Taylor, assistant director of financial assistance and undergraduate admissions, said the federal government has set requirements for financial aid. Therefore, despite the increase in tuition, a student only can receive a maximum amount of aid from the government.

Freshmen can receive a maximum of $2,625, sophomores can get $3,500, juniors and seniors can get $5,500, and graduate students can receive $8,500.

Taylor said students also might receive aid from the state.

"State financial aid is given to students who have high need or the student does exceptional in high school," he said. "The state will determine how much they will get, and they let the school know."

Although Taylor said financial aid should not rise with a tuition increase, he said the loan requirements should be increased to help the students afford college.

"The loan limits have been in place for awhile and as the cost of attendance has risen, students find it more and more difficult to attend. It's getting harder," Taylor said.

Taylor said about 25 to 30 percent of K-State students can afford the cost of tuition, but most of the student body rely on loans and scholarships.

The Office of Student Financial Assistance said the approximate overall cost (tuition, housing, food, etc.) of attending K-State is $10,440 for in-state students and $16,604 for out-of-state students.

Taylor said the tuition hike will increase the amount of total expenditures for in-state students by $360 and by $2,400 for out-of-state students.

"Financial aid is there to assist students," he said. "If the student can't get additional money through loans or scholarships, they may have to get a job, work more hours or take on two jobs."

Due to the attention that academics demand, Miller said many students do not have the time to get a job and need financial aid for tuition costs.

"A lot of people live on financial aid without a job," he said. "They don't think they have the time to get a job because of their schooling. Therefore, everything is paid for by the state. School is enough for a person to have to handle."

Brooks and Miller, who both work to help pay for their tuition, said the relationship between tuition and financial aid has a huge effect on enrollment.

"I don't know the demographics about what percentages are struggling," Brooks said. "But, I know a lot of people who are in the same boat that I am in and are working 30 to 40 hours a week on top of school."

Taylor said it would be difficult to change federal guidelines, but he said a student body president would have to lobby the Legislature for an increase in funding for financial assistance.

Presidential candidate Steve Hall said a student body president must work with the regents to determine if increases affect students' finances.

"The Board of Regents needs a little more information than just what comes from a student advisory committee," Hall said. "They need to know how it affects students. A student body president's job is to nail that and let the board know what personal effects it has on a student."

Snyder takes small steps in building Cats' schedule

Bill Snyder has a long road before him, but he is trying to improve K-State football.

Certainly his transformation of the team from a perennial conference and national weakling to a powerhouse has been a small step in the right direction.

OK, it's been a gargantuan leap in the right direction.

However, for the past several years,

Snyder has received heavy criticism for his practice of scheduling non-conference cupcakes for his overpowering Wildcats to demolish.

Now he is trying to improve the schedule, as well.

The Cats' latest schedule was released Thursday and features several definite improvements from pushovers past.

To begin with, the Cats will kick off the season with the Eddie Robinson Classic in Kansas City, Mo., against Big 10 team Iowa. While Iowa has not been the same dominant team of years past, it still features a marquee name played prominently at the beginning of the season.

Iowa also brings in a tougher schedule, which could help K-State in the dreaded strength-of-schedule category in the Bowl Championship Series rankings.

Perhaps the biggest improvement is Louisiana Tech, a team that beat eventual Southeastern Conference Champion Alabama last season.

Tech finished 8-3, with losses to only Florida State, USC and Texas A&M.

These additions to the schedule are certainly only small improvements. However, Snyder has been working to schedule even bigger opponents. Talks with Michigan, USC and Notre Dame have yet to yield any new matchups.

Still, K-State is moving toward a more formidable schedule. The Cats aren't getting there fast, but they're getting there.

Remember, Snyder's philosophy always has been small steps.

Changes result from transforming people's hearts

Why do I address the issue of the Bible and slavery?

What relevance does this have today, on a secular campus? There are three reasons. First, I want to leave no doubt in anyone's mind that the Bible never can be used to justify any prejudices they may have. Second, as this is Black History Month, I want to examine how slavery was abolished. Third, we will see how real transformation, first of individuals and then of society, is possible.

In the past, at least in America, people have attempted to justify slavery and discrimination by claiming that it was God's intention and that the Bible supported it. One of the most commonly cited texts is Genesis 9, which contains the statement, "Cursed be Canaan! The lowest of slaves will he be to his brothers." This was directed only at the Canaanite nation and was not a condemnation but an accurate prediction of their wickedness. Still, at least one Canaanite, Rahab, was considered righteous enough to be listed in the genealogy of Jesus Christ.

In the Law of Moses, Hebrew slaves were required to be freed every seven years. Slavery was acknowledged but not encouraged, and the slaves had rights and could not be mistreated (though not as fully as other citizens).

Slavery in this time, through the time of the Roman Empire and even beyond, primarily was an economic institution, the ancient equivalent of bankruptcy. It often was temporary. In the Roman Empire, there were slaves who did menial labor and slaves who were highly educated and served as teachers to families or artists.

The apostle Paul did not call for the overthrow of slavery, since this would have gotten him killed and accomplished nothing else. He did command slave owners to treat their slaves fairly, justly and with respect. He repeatedly declared that both slave and free, rich and poor, were equals before God.

When Jesus came, rather than preaching the overthrow of the Roman economic system (which included slavery), he preached something more practical and ultimately much more powerful. As New Testament scholar Donald A. Carson notes, "He came to free men and women from their sins. And here's my point: what his message does is transform people so they begin to love God with all their heart, soul, mind and strength and to love their neighbor as themselves.

The overthrow of slavery, then, is through the transformation of men and women by the gospel. In the final analysis, if you want lasting change, you've got to transform the hearts of human beings. And that was Jesus' mission."

As economist, historian and scholar Thomas Sowell points out, the driving force for the abolition of slavery was the evangelical awakening in England. Evangelist/statesman William Wilberforce and former slave trader John Newton, who wrote the words to "Amazing Grace" after his conversion, pushed abolition through Parliament and then used the British navy to stop the slave trade across the Atlantic and in the Arab world. In the United States, revival preacher Charles Finney, as well as numerous abolition societies, openly proclaimed the teaching of Jesus as their motivation for opposing slavery. Within Africa, the legendary Christian missionary and explorer David Livingstone continually worked to end slavery.

As Charles Colson and Nancy Pearcey note, "When the heart is transformed, that will inevitably change the way people structure their external relationships. That's precisely why Christians in the West came to see slavery as incompatible with the God-given dignity of all people, and why many believers became leaders of the abolition movement." Since the Bible repeatedly condemns oppression of the poor and of workers in extremely strong terms (see Isaiah 58:3-10 and James 5:1-6 for two examples), it was clear that a system that allowed and encouraged this had to be ended. Acknowledging that all human beings are created in the image of God, they saw the evil of any system or philosophy that claimed that one race or ethnicity was inferior or superior to any other.

This, then, is how real change comes about. It begins with the changing of individual human hearts. It is then that these people, motivated by love and founded on a worldview that acknowledges God's unchanging moral standards, worked to change society and to see justice enacted through the government.

I see three conclusions from all of this. First, people will twist or misinterpret any source, whether it be the Bible, the Constitution, history or science in attempt to justify evil actions or motives. Second, history indicates that it largely was through the practical living out of the Gospel and Jesus' command to love our neighbors as our own selves that slavery was abolished in most countries. Third, while secular programs to improve society and restore justice have sometimes worked, they often are possible only because of spiritually motivated people and lasting spiritual change.

We now see just how true Jesus' words from 2000 years ago are: "The Spirit of the Lord is on me, because he has anointed me to preach good news to the poor. He has sent me to proclaim freedom for the prisoners, to release the oppressed" (Isaiah 61:1,2; Luke 4:18).

I think K-State should bring a real rock band to Manhattan. All in favor of Spinal Tap, say "aye."

I have a guinea pig, a foosball table and 80 feet of race tracks in my apartment, and I still can't get a date.

Hey, Wefald. The Texas basketball team is going to be here on Saturday. You think you can keep your mouth shut until after the game this time?

If I wanted to read about the Bible, I would have gone to Manhattan Christian College.

Are you absolutely sure that there is no absolute truth?

This is called an opinion page because this is where people can freely express their opinions. No one is pushing anything on you, so quit whining.

Does anyone else think that the groundhog was bluffing?

If we're going to take actions against those who have been ripping us off, we should start with the textbook sellers and with Parking Services.

I think the Campus Fourum should be called the daily dose of stupidity.

It really is sad that the chemistry department allows such terrible professors to continue teaching even after years of complaints by students. So much for K-State caring about its students.

Claeys, Metzinger to fight tuition hikes

To many, K-State is part of their history ... their family.

Jeremy Claeys and Amy Metzinger are running for student body president and vice president to ensure all students have the opportunity to make K-State part of their family and their future.

Our platform is based on the fundamental belief that students should have access to an affordable, quality education at K-State. Together, we offer students the best opportunity to find positive solutions to the issues we face as a campus community.

Our top priority as student body president and vice president will be to stop the spiraling increases in tuition we have faced during the past six years.

We are committed to working with the Kansas Legislature and the Kansas Board of Regents to enact a 3-year tuition freeze to allow the state to increase its share of funding for our education. We want to restore the informal agreement that kept our tuition at 25 percent of the real cost of our education, a number that has risen to 31.4 percent in recent years.

We think the continued increases in tuition will price many students out of an education at K-State. Together, we can accomplish this goal, just as students worked to raise faculty salaries in the past when it was made a student priority.

Our campus plan includes the expansion of KATS as a central resource for campus services online. We will work with campus organizations to make services available such as Lafene Health Center appointments and Wildcat Card balances. To encourage greater use of this system, we also will work to remove the $4 online enrollment fee.

Our ambitious plan, however, shouldn't allow us to overlook an issue that seems to be absent in campaigns this year. As our campus grows, we have an obligation to ensure minority students a voice in student government. We propose a standing committee on minority affairs as a first step that would encourage a minority voice in Student Senate.

Looking to the future, we support the creation of a community transportation system in Manhattan, but oppose a system that only includes the funding of K-State students and serves only a small portion of campus. We encourage a permanent solution while the city develops that community system.

We will not advocate a privilege fee to accomplish our goals, and we oppose using student money to relocate offices or to repeat services offered at no cost by the city.

We have had the opportunity to be a part of many organizations on campus, including residence hall, greek and off-campus living, making us sensitive to the needs of all students. We know we don't have all the answers, but we believe you deserve to know where we stand and what our priorities are. We appreciate your support and suggestions.

Thank you, and remember to vote for leadership that works — Claeys/Metzinger.

JEREMY CLAEYS AMY METZINGER

Brooks, Miller shift campaign focus to representation, leadership skills

K-State has made a name for itself nationally and has become one of the better — if not the best — public universities in the country through academics, athletics, prestigious scholarships, intramural programs, the greek system, research and the Student Governing Association.

This was made possible with the help of outstanding leadership, great faculty and the best student population in the country.

If elected, we will ride the wave that past and present K-Staters have built and keep it rolling through this new millennium.

Representation and leadership of K-State are our primary platforms and should be for any presidential ticket.

The student body president and vice president represent K-State to the Kansas Legislature, the Kansas Board of Regents and alumni groups, as well as distinguished guests, as the voice of the students.

We are prepared to take on this important role for our school.

Through hard work and dedication, we not only would keep the wave rolling, but build upon it and make it even better for next year.

We also are aware of internal conflicts that occur on campus and are evaluating realistically what we can do to get things changed for the better. Don't worry — "We've got issues."

Second in our platform would be a change in financial aid.

As our tuition and student fees continue to rise, our financial aid remains a constant in the whole scheme of things.

The problem is many of us are eating ramen noodles and aren't looking forward to what looms after ramen is out of our budget.

We hope to lobby to the Board of Regents, as well as alumni, to set up programs to increase the amount of financial aid as a solution to the rising costs, not only in school, but also the cost of living.

Next, something needs to be worked out for a fall break that would include the Monday and Tuesday before Thanksgiving break, which would increase the total break from five days to nine days.

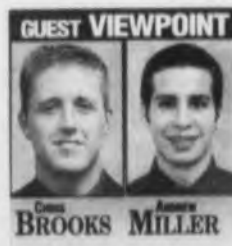

We think a good solution to this would be to start each semester a day early if it is needed to balance out for the two days we'd miss during the break. This, we feel, would give students a much deserved and desired break.

Finally, I would like to thank all of those who have supported this campaign, and whichever way it goes, it will have been successful.

Jeremy Claeys, junior in electronic journalism and political science, and Amy Metzinger, sophomore in agricultural economics, say they plan to target six goals if elected student body president and vice president.

Claeys, Metzinger platform targets 6 goals

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Specific plans to accomplish each issue are what set running mates Jeremy Claeys and Amy Metzinger apart from the others.

Claeys, junior in electronic journalism and political science, also said their plans target six main goals that many other candidates will not even discuss.

One of these is their concern for minority involvement in Student Senate.

"In the next year or two, we really have to do something bold to make a change so minorities are represented," he said.

"When they aren't represented, their voices aren't heard, and mistakes can be made."

Metzinger, sophomore in agricultural economics, said they hope to accomplish this by creating a Minority Affairs Committee on Student Senate.

First, this would allow a forum where minority students would feel comfortable bringing up issues, Claeys said, and second, it would encourage them to become involved in Student Senate.

Another issue Claeys said he feels strongly about is a tuition freeze.

"It's becoming such a tremendous burden that people are having to leave college," he said. "They're going to price Kansas kids out of an education."

These are just two of the six issues that brought Claeys and Metzinger together.

"He approached me about running for vice president," she said. "We discussed the things we felt strongly about on campus, and they seemed to really match up."

"I think that we've attacked some issues that are really the concerns of students. Hopefully, we can put students at ease by proposing and accomplishing the proposals that are out there."

Both candidates have been involved in Senate, and they have had different leadership positions. Their Web site is at www.claeys.com.

Claeys served on the Senate Allocations Committee, was executive director of KSDB-FM 91.9 and is now the public affairs director for KSAL. Metzinger is a House of Representatives intern, serves on the Agricultural Council and is the Student Government Intern Coordinator.

They also have had the opportunity to live in greek housing, residence halls and off-campus housing, something Claeys said helps them better relate to all students.

"I've had a lot of experiences at K-State," he said. "I hope I've taken advantage of that. It's the variety of experiences that qualifies me."

Involvement with Senate issues that address the parking problem at K-State also led the two running mates to propose the construction of a multi-level parking structure.

Although they said they support a citywide transit system, they prefer to focus on the immediate problem.

"We've looked at (Jason) Heinrich's research," Claeys said. "The costs varies, and it's not fair to students. We don't think that's the solution."

Metzinger and Claeys said they are looking to alumni donors to finance the cost, and that they prefer a funding solution that does not involve students, except for a minimum maintenance fee.

The other three issues they said they want to address include a privilege-fee review to keep costs down, expanding KATS services and adding more lighting and crosswalk systems.

"There is a culmination of issues that I didn't think would get resolved unless Amy and I ran and accomplished them. Our platform deals with six major issues that affect all students at K-State," Claeys said. "We don't really have goals that target a particular group of students. Our goals reach out to everyone."

Presidential hopefuls look for tuition freeze

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tuition freeze is an issue that Jeremy Claeys, student body presidential candidate, said he is adamant about.

Claeys, junior in electronic journalism and political science, took last semester off because he could not afford K-State.

"It's just getting ridiculous," he said. "It's important for students and parents to plan for education and pay for it."

Both Claeys and Amy Metzinger, sophomore in agricultural economics, have been researching K-State's tuition numbers during the past five years and said they found that the average cost has increased $1,000 per year.

In response to this, they have been meeting with legislators and have talked to some who have liked the idea.

"We've had positive responses," Claeys said. "It's an election year, and legislators look to where their voting blocks are, and we need to take advantage of that."

The biggest problem, he said, is students are not going up there and making their voices heard often enough.

In addition, Claeys said they need to get the backing of several groups, including the Board of Regents, the House Appropriation Committee and the House Education Committee.

"It's going to be a long process, but it'll be worth the effort," he said. "We need to guilt them into giving us our money back."

However, since a specific plan has not been developed or presented, it is hard for some to agree.

Bill Docking, chairman of the Kansas Board of Regents, said although he disagrees with a tuition freeze, he does not want to judge prematurely and wants students to know the board would look at any proposal they are presented with.

"Talking in general, I would not favor a tuition freeze," Docking said. "With the exception of tuition decisions made this year, the Board of Regents has held that tuition increases keep up with the rate of inflation. Otherwise, the quality of education would decrease."

Student body presidential candidate Jake Worcester shared this opinion.

Worcester, senior in agricultural economics, said a tuition freeze only would hurt K-State students.

"We can't afford to have it with increasing enrollment and increasing demands on faculty and services," he said. "A tuition freeze isn't going to happen. It's not feasible."

Although he does not have specific plans to fight tuition increases, Worcester said he will voice his concerns as a representative on the student advisory committee to the regents.

"Tuition increase is definitely a concern of mine. I believe very strongly that we have to keep the cost of education down," he said. "The best things a student can do are keep an open mind and see issues as they come up and what will be beneficial to the university as a whole."

Chris Brooks, junior in business administration, is another candidate who said he agrees with this view.

Better student body representation at legislature could bring about changes, he said.

"K-State is an awesome value," he said. "It's really hard to complain, but there is a problem with the increases."

Other options include increasing financial aid and talking to the regents about their concerns, Brooks said.

Next year's legislative session is when Claeys said his plan will see some movement. When the Legislature starts cutting budgets, it cuts into student services, he said, and this is something that causes privilege fees to go up.

"We will be there to fight for this," Claeys said. "There's no reason for them not to listen."

Supporting this view is Phil Anderson, faculty representative to Student Senate.

Anderson said legislature is shifting the burden more and more onto the consumer, who is the student.

"The students have a right to request a solution," he said. "They should be fighting for their own best interest."

According to a 1997-98 report released by Marvin Burris, the director of fiscal affairs at the Board of Regents, K-State students are now paying 31.4 percent of their real education.

That is compared to the 25 percent they paid in the 1960s, Claeys said.

"It's been done in the past, and we'll continue to fight in the future," he said. "It's a feasible plan, and it can happen."

Women's basketball team falls to Huskers 56-65 despite surge late in game

Maybe the K-State women's basketball team should start its games behind by 12 points.

In the Cats' 56-65 loss to Nebraska (15-11, 9-6), K-State (12-16, 5-10) did not play well until it was facing a 40-52 deficit with less than eight minutes remaining in the second half, K-State head coach Deb Patterson said.

"About the time we got down by 12, the next five minutes was probably the best basketball we played all night," Patterson said. "We stopped turning the ball over, we maximized possessions, we dug in and made some stops."

K-State was energized partially by a technical foul on Husker guard Brooke Schwartz. Schwartz received the technical after committing a dead-ball push and then walking away from the official as he tried to explain the call, Nebraska head coach Paul Sanderford said.

The Cats then were able to go on a quick 4-0 run to close the gap to within two points of Nebraska, despite the deafening roar that ensued from the near-sell-out crowd.

STORY BY MICHAEL NOLL

K-State was able to pull within two points of Nebraska on two occasions in the game's waning minutes, but then the Cats returned to playing the kind of basketball that had led to the double-digit deficit.

For almost the entire game, K-State's offense was firing without its most lethal guns, its perimeter players, who only made four baskets in the contest. As a result, the Cats essentially were playing with just two players on offense, Patterson said.

"We don't necessarily get production out of that point guard position offensively, so now we're at four scorers on the court. If Kim Woodlee is struggling, now you're at three," Patterson said. "If Kristin Rethman is struggling, one every 10 minutes, now you've got two scorers on the court."

The most glaring weakness in the Cats' guards' performance was the play of Woodlee, who averages nearly 35 minutes a game in conference play but saw

Women take 3rd at Big 12 track meet

K-State's women's team placed third in the Big 12 Conference indoor track and field championships this weekend with 90.5 points.

The Cats were led by pole vaulter Erin Anderson, who set a meet record with a jump of 13 feet 1 1/2 inches. She won a competition that included 1999 pole vault champion Iowa State vaulter Andrea Branson.

Anderson said she felt good heading into the competition Friday.

"The way I warmed up today I felt great," Anderson said. "I felt in such a rhythm all day. Andrea (Branson) is a great competitor. To beat her at the Big 12s, when it counts, is a great feeling."

Anderson's mark was a NCAA automatic qualifying mark.

A week off for the distance medley relay also paid off, as the team of Amy Mortimer, Amanda Crouse, Bromeka Holmes and Korene Hinds won the distance medley relay with a Big 12 Conference record time of 11:20.71.

K-State head track and field coach Cliff Rovelto said each of the women filled her role well.

"What it comes down to is giving it to the anchor to win, and Korene obviously did a great job," Rovelto said. "Every girl before had to keep us in the race."

Hinds also won the 1,000 meters as she posted a personal record of 2:45.78. K-State assistant track and field coach Randy Cole said he was pleased with the performances from all of his runners.

"They contributed greatly in a variety of events," Cole said. "But we had a balanced attack. Their performance level was indicative of consistent training."

On the men's side, Justin Robinson won the 2000 Big 12 Heptathlon Championship with 5,461 points. Robinson said that after the first day of competition on Friday, he needed to bounce back strong.

"After the first day, I was off from where I wanted to be," Robinson said. "Going into the 800 meter, I knew exactly what I needed to do to win. It was the exact pace I wanted, and it felt good."

Athletes' behavior outside of arenas hurts fan support

It's late February, and the sports world is getting old, real old. No, not the games themselves the games are as strong as ever.

On the floor, athletes such as Toronto Raptors player Vince Carter still can captivate the mind and imagination. They can steal on the court, take over games and inspire us with their athletic talents.

What I am talking about is what is taking place off the courts, in the streets and bars. The incidents involving crime, drug use and off-the-field shenanigans.

Couple that with the K-State men's basketball team woes this season, and the questions get tiresome. It still is easier to take their struggles than it is what several athletes are doing.

Quite frankly, I am tired of Darryl Strawberry and having to hear about whether he can stay clean. He needs help, not a new baseball glove. I am tired of hearing about Kansas City Chiefs players who have numerous run-ins with the law.

Pick an athlete who recently has been involved in an off-the-field scandal, who, with no sense of pride, has threatened to tear another shred of American sports.

One has to wonder, can we regain a world where respect still matters and the Golden Rule isn't obsolete? Now, I am not going to get all religious — this is much simpler than religion. Besides, I don't really care what people believe, but instead I wish people simply would carry themselves with some pride, respect and goodwill. I think respect is a value that transcends any religion or theology.

But, hey, the weather outside is beautiful and spring training is here. Enough philosophic chatter and negativity. The sports world still has baseball.

If you want a reason to love sports again, and you are tired of watching highlights from the Super Bowl, watch the Kansas City Royals. If you want to believe in a group of players, and watch a team with more upside and potential than Mel Kiper Jr., NFL draft guru can dream of, cheer for the Royals. If you want to hop on a bandwagon and are tired of all this off-the-field crap, cheer for the Royals.

Skeptics will ask, "Why cheer for the Royals? Have you seen this team's bullpen?" Well, that might be true; the bullpen might be a question mark. Still, the Royals have a team of players who are hungry, who love to play baseball and have helped this team captivate Kansas City. If people cannot get excited about watching Carlos Beltran and Carlos Febles play baseball 81 times inside Kauffman Stadium, they are not fans of the game.

If they cannot get excited about the numbers Jermaine Dye and company are going to put up this year, they are not a fan of the game. Honestly, the enthusiasm doesn't stop with Royals, but it vibrates throughout Major League Baseball.

Places such as Cincinnati, where Ken Griffey Jr. has come home, and to places such as Pittsburgh, where the small market plan seems to be working. The small market enthusiasm is coupled with the fact

2nd half offense hurts Cats at Tech

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LUBBOCK, Texas — Rayford Young wanted to make sure this game didn't slip through Texas Tech's fingers.

So, when it came down to crunch time Saturday, Young helped will the Red Raiders to a 75-64 Big 12 Conference victory over K-State by scoring 25 points, including nine in the game's final four minutes.

"I didn't want to see this one get away from us," Young said. "If we had lost, I would have been upset because I had five turnovers. I just wanted to take control."

Leading 64-59 with four minutes remaining, Young grabbed a teammate's blocked shot out of the air, took two dribbles and drilled a 15-footer that staked the Red Raiders to a seven-point lead.

"He showed why he's an all-league player," K-State coach Tom Asbury said. "He's just an awfully good player."

Young followed moments later with a driving basket that gave Tech a nine-point cushion, and then added a three-pointer and a 10-footer in the final two minutes that helped keep the Wildcats at bay while assuring Tech of its third league win in its past four outings.

"I didn't think either team played with much emotion in the first half," Tech head coach James Dickey said. "But I thought we did a good job in the second half of building a lead and then extending it."

The Raiders (12-13, 3-11 Big 12) led 39-33 at halftime by scoring the final eight points of the half. Tech then stretched the lead to 46-37 with 17:22 remaining on a three-point play by Young.

K-State (9-16, 2-12) battled back, eventually narrowing the gap to 52-51 on a three-point play by Quentin Buchanan. Moments later, the Wildcats took their first lead of the second half on a follow shot by Kelvin Howell.

K-State cut it to one at 60-59 on free throw by Buchanan with 7:54 left, but then went scoreless until Cortez Groves hit a three-pointer, his fifth of the game, with 2:35 left.

"We became much less efficient on offense in the second half," Asbury said. "We didn't show great poise. We got some great looks, but the shots just didn't drop."

Tech pushed the lead back to 64-59 on four straight points by Jayson Mitchell, setting the stage for Young's heroics down the stretch.

Young was joined in double figures by James Ware, who had 15 points, and Brodney Kennard, who had 14 points and 16 rebounds.

Tech outrebounded the Wildcats 39-32.

"We made Brodney Kennard look like Hakeem Olajuwon," Asbury said. "The rebounding was crucial."

The Wildcats were led by Howell's 20 points. Groves finished with 17 points while Buchanan added 11.

just 17 minutes of action in Lincoln. The cut in playing time was not due to her inability to score, though, Patterson said.

"The second half I was more concerned with the fact that she was not defending as opposed to not scoring," Patterson said. "Not necessarily aggressive against the press, and then I think she struggled defensively, keeping people in front of her." Patterson said Woodlee was not the only Cat playing poorly, and she said the Cats had difficulty combating the Cornhuskers' aggressiveness.

"I don't necessarily believe early in the game against the pressure, any one of our players played aggressively," Patterson said.

Sanderford was more concise.

"We outworked K-State," Sanderford said.

The Cats' poor handling of Nebraska's pressure defense allowed the Huskers to force 17 turnovers in the first half and 28 for the game. To combat the pressure, K-State tried to distribute the ball-handling responsibilities by having Woodlee and Rethman bring the ball up the floor instead of point guards April Sailors and Morgen Finneran.

K-State forward Angie Finkes said the physical Husker pressure forced K-State into mistakes.

"Especially at the beginning of the game, everybody was a little wound up. They kind of threw the ball all over the court," Finkes said. "I think we were trying to maybe do things too fast on offense. We were holding the ball too long instead of getting it to the open person."

One player who did find it easy to handle defensive pressure was Nebraska's guard Nicole Kubik, who scored 19 points. All night long Kubik was able to find the open spot, whether it was outside the perimeter, the mid-range jump shot or in the paint.

Kubik made the same kind of play against K-State in Manhattan, so it was not unexpected, Finkes said.

"She's a big-time player, and she showed that tonight," Kubik said. "When it got close she wanted the ball, and she took it to the basket, and she made shots."

Cats' pitching falters; Aggies score 35 runs

By MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Texas A&M hitters clobbered K-State pitching for 35 runs in the Aggies' three-game sweep of the Wildcats over the weekend.

K-State (2-7, 0-3 Big 12) now has lost seven straight games, the longest losing skid since 1997 when the Cats lost 11 straight.

The Wildcats jumped out to a 4-0 lead early in the first game of the series Friday, but Texas A&M (8-7, 3-0) stormed back, scoring six runs in the fifth inning and eight in the sixth to win 19-5 in a seven-inning, run-rule-shortened game.

Senior Jason Wells (0-2) took the loss for the Wildcats. He pitched 4 1/3 innings, allowing eight runs on 11 hits, while striking out five and walking four.

Senior second baseman Chad Tabor led off the game with a single and was followed by junior third baseman Josh Cavender, who reached base on an error.

Senior designated hitter Travis André fled out to score Tabor, and junior outfielder Ben Oleen singled home Cavender to push K-State's lead to 2-0.

In the second inning, junior first baseman Mark English led off with a double and scored when junior outfielder Chris Nelson cracked a double two batters later. Junior outfielder Kasey Weishaar knocked in Nelson with a sacrifice fly to give the Cats a 4-0 head start on the Aggies.

Oleen, English and Nelson had two hits apiece in the game, with each also scoring a run.

K-State freshman starting pitcher Derek Ver Helst and pitching coach Mike Hensley were ejected in the second inning from Saturday's 9-4 loss to the Aggies.

Texas A&M catcher Jason Gremminger had hit his second two-run homer of the game in the second inning to make the score 9-0 Aggies, when Ver Helst hit the next batter, designated hitter Rusty Meyer, and was tossed out along with Hensley.

Freshman Todd Lundwall then entered the game and threw 6 1/3 innings of shutout ball, allowing a single hit to the Aggies, while striking out one and walking three.

Cavender led the seven-hit K-State attack from the plate, going 2-for-4 with two runs scored.

K-State again took an early lead, scoring two runs in the first inning and then adding two more in the fifth, against Texas A&M on Sunday.

The Cats' early runs would not be enough down the stretch, though. The Cats allowed three runs in the sixth and seventh innings to drop their seventh straight game by a score of 9-4.

Luke Robertson (1-2) started and took the loss for K-State. The Cats will try to halt the losing streak when the team returns home at 2 p.m. Tuesday to play Southern Nazarene.

that a new collective bargaining agreement with revenue sharing appears on the horizon.

One thing, however, can damage the game that is thriving. The reinstatement of baseball career hits leader Pete Rose. Reinstating Rose would be horrible for baseball and make it too close of a parallel to professional boxing and World Championship Wrestling.

The reason is simple — if Strawberry uses cocaine daily and gets caught every time, that hurts him and not baseball.

It won't matter to the Royals, and it certainly will not affect their quest for new ownership, which, after seven years, finally is in the home stretch.

If Rose is let back into baseball, he is going to damage the game's integrity. He was kicked out of the game on charges of gambling, and Rose knows that there is to be no gambling in baseball. He was wrong and if he is let back into the game, baseball will have a shadow of corruption. Its integrity forever will be tarnished.

It would be a step back for the game, and one that right now, when so many things seem to be clicking, is a step baseball cannot afford to take.

City gains lawsuit of shelter

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The city of Manhattan now has control over the T. Russell Reitz Animal Shelter — but control isn't its only responsibility.

A lawsuit filed in March 1998 by a shelter employee for wrongful termination also is in the city's hands.

"We're all in the 'what if' situation right now," City Commissioner Karen McCulloh said.

Because the lawsuit was filed in federal court, it will take the judge some time to rule — maybe by the middle of the year, City Attorney Bill Frost said.

Insurance and funds from the Health Department will cover most of the expenses, but the city's main concern is whether the employee will be awarded wages.

"What is at risk now is back and future wages," said Chuck Murphy, Health Department director/health officer.

Murphy said there is no decision as to what money will be used if the employee is awarded wages.

The process for this lawsuit does not change now that the city has control of the shelter, because the employee filed against the Health Department, the city and the county, Murphy said.

Meanwhile, city commissioners will await the judge's response.

"The city has agreed to accept the liabilities of the animal shelter. We take responsibility for all of this," McCulloh said. "Basically, it's a very standard transition agreement."

This new ownership might bring some new changes too, McCulloh said.

The shelter is interviewing candidates for a director's position, something that is needed, she said.

"We have to get a really good director," McCulloh said. "I do think we can do a lot more outreach. I would like to see the animal shelter get more involved with the public."

Recycling pilot program doing well after 1st year

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Reducing, reusing and recycling are three of the goals for the pilot recycling program at K-State.

In its initial year, the program is doing well and continues to collect materials, from plastic bottles to cardboard, in a growing amount, said John Woods, director of facilities and custodial services.

"We encourage people to continue to put their beverage containers in the bins both inside and outside of all the buildings," Woods said. "We have also seen an increase in the amount that has been recycled — from 84 tons to almost 200 tons since the program began."

The recycling program, which started in early 1999, receives funds, in part, through city/university funding.

Woods said the original allocation for the recycling program was $64,000. A portion of this, $23,000, is spread through a four-year period and goes toward student wages and educational material in support of the program.

The remainder of the budget is used for recycling containers for the campus.

"The money from city/university funding is to help the program grow and to keep it ongoing," Woods said.

A budget request also has been passed to bring another $48,000 to the program's budget.

Woods said this money will be used for a forklift, a covered truck and more containers to be used both indoors and outdoors.

However, he said this money will not become available for use until 2001.

"Right now, we have a pickup truck with a wire cage to collect material," Woods said. "In addition to that, we want to have a covered box truck with a power tailgate that will allow us to pick up heavier material with the tailgate. This way we can get more inside."

Woods said there is basically no ongoing funding for the recycling program, so most of the remainder comes from the custodial budget.

He said the administration pays $33 a ton for every ton taken to the recycling center. However, this is what they would pay if the same material were taken to the landfill.

Howie's Recycling Inc. also has begun to pay the university for the cardboard, whereas previously, they only paid for aluminum.

Woods said the goal now is to gather a higher volume of material to be recycled and so far, he said, the program has been successful.

Woods said a primary reason for the success of the program is a bailer that is on loan from Howie's. He said this allows the substantial amount of cardboard that is received daily to be bailed and placed in a storage area, where Howie's picks up the bails on a weekly basis.

"In the past, we would have to make daily trips to Howie's with cardboard," Woods said. "This has helped us tremendously by not having to have facilities run out there every day with a load."

At this time, the bailer is being stored in a storage barn primarily used for grounds equipment.

"Right now, we are seeking other avenues in which to store the bailer and keep the recycling program going," Woods said. "Without a facility, the program will be in serious jeopardy."

Woods said new recycling containers funded by Pepsi also have been added to the residence halls.

He said Pepsi has been eager in trying to work out a system and see what it can do to help the program.

"Pepsi has been and will continue to be very willing in working with us to help the recycling program," Woods said.

Woods said another program that

MIKE SHEPHERD/COLLEGIAN

Jeff Tripe, graduate student in biology, sorts through a bag of empty pop cans and bottles last week in the storage barn north of University Gardens. Nearly 200 tons of recyclables have been collected since the program started last spring, but the program needs more money to continue efficiently.

has helped in the recycling program's growing success is the process of taking old dumpsters and painting them blue. These are then available to be used for dumping cardboard or other materials.

Dumpsters are now at Bramlage Coliseum, the Veterinary Medicine Complex and Dykstra Hall, and more will be available in the future.

Amy Dix, junior in biochemistry, said she has been helping with the recycling program for some time. She said students in the residence halls elect a hall environmental chair who then oversees separate chairs for each floor.

"The ones that recycle are the ones who make the effort or care a lot about the environment," Dix said. "If it were made easy, I think more would do their part in helping the program."

Because of the recent contract K-State entered into with Pepsi Cola, most of the can machines have been replaced with bottles. Woods said the recycling containers inside the buildings all have been switched to handle bottles.

He said, however, that before students put bottles into these containers, the caps must be taken off.

"The tops are recyclable, however they are not of the same material as the bottles, and Howie's will not accept them with the caps," Woods said. "It would help everyone out a lot if these caps were removed prior to putting them in the containers."

Woods said that with the new bottle machines, there is still a substantial amount of aluminum cans seen in trash cans throughout campus. He said he encourages all students to keep putting aluminum cans in the same containers as the bottles because they can still be recycled by the university.

Dix said it is necessary for everyone to do their part in the program because it is so easy to recycle.

"Why not recycle?" Dix said. "I don't think a lot of us realize how precious the earth really is, and we should do our part to make it a better place."

"My understanding is that these evaluations of Barb Robel have been glowing, particularly in the past five years," McCree said.

Although evaluations of Robel have been good, Goodpasture declined to comment about any ideas about the case's potential outcome.

"I have no idea. I have to wait and see the case first," he said. "That's totally inappropriate for me to say. It's like a judge making a decision before he's even heard any of the evidence."

Panhellenic Council president Kellie McClellan also said she thought it was important to remain neutral prior to the meeting.

"I don't want people to feel I'm making a judgment before I've even heard the complaints," she said.

Although the complaints have not formally been made, McCree — a former K-State IFC president — said he did not think the issue was limited to Robel's role as Greek Affairs adviser.

"I think this is a larger issue than Barb Robel," McCree said. "It is an issue of, will Kansas State hold individual chapters accountable for their actions?"

He said accountability issues stem from the way K-State's greek system is structured.

"There are some alumni who are displeased with the university's stance on particular issues and with the setup of self-governance at K-State," he said.

The current structure of K-State's greek system allows IFC and Panhellenic councils to act largely independently of the university. In order to maintain that independence, the adviser for Greek Affairs is chosen by IFC and Panhellenic Council and is paid by the dues of fraternity and sorority members.

"Currently, student funds pay for advisory support," McCree said. "The Interfraternity and Panhellenic councils are truly self-governing."

said the self-governance of the greek system has been in place at K-State for some time.

"It seems like since the beginning of time, fraternities and sororities' dues have paid for programs, personnel and activities," Bosco said.

McCree, who spent time working for the National Interfraternity Conference, said K-State is one of only a few universities in the nation with a self-governing structure.

This, he said, helps to make K-State's greek system one of the nation's best.

"K-State is one of the top three to five greek systems in the country," McCree said. "I certainly feel confident in K-State as a system."

Because of this success, he said, Barb Robel's job should be safe, even if the structure of the system is called into question.

"The success of our greek system is due, in large part, to Barb Robel. I think Barb Robel should be part of any restructuring that takes place."

Bosco, however, said he did not have any knowledge of plans to suggest any restructuring. If it were brought up, he said he did not know what to expect.

Bosco said he will, at the request of the parties involved, be present at the meeting.

"The Interfraternity Council, Panhellenic council and alumni have asked me to serve as facilitator," he said. "Obviously, the university has an interest, so it's just natural."

While McCree did not say what course of action should be taken at the meeting — which will be at 8 tonight in the Union Big 12 Room — he did say he thought the meeting itself was a poor turn of events.

He said the fact that alumni, not students, were calling for the meeting served to take the power away from students.

"I don't think this type of meeting sets a good precedent for any vocal alumni to be able to call a meeting to voice their opinion on something they have a problem with," McCree said. "I think the decision should be left in the hands of the students."

This balance of interest means that an equal number of men and women, as well as minority and student representation, must be taken into consideration, White said. The position's candidates also demonstrate a balance.

"We're very sensitive about the need to recruit as many candidates as we can who are women and minorities," White said.

The assistant dean position, vacated more than a year ago upon an employee's retirement, attracted piles of résumés, which were narrowed to five candidates.

The search committee is looking at four of these candidates, after a fifth candidate received a job offer from another university. Two of the four are faculty members at K-State, but their affiliation with the university will not give them an advantage over other candidates, White said.

Larry Williams, member of the search committee and director of the Division of Biology, said the new assistant dean would be assigned a number of duties, especially as the chairperson of K-State's reinstatement committee.

"Of all the deans, this position probably has the most direct student interaction," Williams said. "If, for example, you have been dismissed from the university, you have to go through that position to get back in."

White said the assistant dean also would be responsible for advising within the college.

Serving as a liaison with other advising components on campus, the assistant dean will work with department heads on advising issues, White said. The person will serve as the supervisor for advisers of the open option program and pay close attention to student athletes.

"The assistant dean sees that athletes, in order to stay eligible, have to make progress toward their degree," Williams said.

Two presentations remain for the search committee: Lynn Bartock of Southwest State University will interview at 2 p.m. today in Union 207, and Virginia Sylvester, interim assistant dean, will interview at 2 p.m. Wednesday in the same room.

The search committee will make a recommendation to Peter Nicholls, dean of arts and sciences, who will make the final decision. The decision should be made in mid-March, White said.

CENSUS

before students will be allowed to enroll and vote for SGA candidates. An e-mail was written to explain the requirement, he said, but some students were angry.

"Some students felt the university was doing this," Jones said. "We recognize that student time is valuable."

Katie Willis, sophomore in nursing, said this will ensure that all students comply with the state request.

Jones said the census will be used to redraw legislative districts. He said K-State students can choose to either put their home address as Manhattan or the town they grew up in.

Willis' hometown is in Kentucky, but she said she is going to indicate Manhattan as her permanent residence.

If Willis' parents were to include her as a Kentucky resident when they fill out the federal census, Jones said this would have no effect on the Kansas census. He said the census is designed for Kansas legislative purposes only and will not affect the federal census.

Thousands protest acquittal of 4 officers for Diallo beating, death

By RICHARD PYLE
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — New demands for social justice, law-enforcement reforms and a federal inquiry echoed from pulpits and city streets on Sunday in the aftermath of the acquittal of four police officers in the shooting death of Amadou Diallo.

More than 1,000 people joined a peaceful prayer vigil outside the United Nations, where activist Rev. Al Sharpton said he hoped to bring the Diallo case to international attention.

The shooting victim "could have been one of these ambassadors," Sharpton said. He also said he was calling for another jury to hear evidence on the policies of Mayor Rudolph Giuliani.

"Come November, the jury is going to render its decision," he said, referring to Giuliani's probable run for the U.S. Senate against first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Some in the crowd wore signs reading: "Go ahead and shoot. I'm black, so it must be justified."

In what was billed as a day of prayer, political leaders and activists joined Sharpton in criticizing the verdicts as inappropriate for a case in which police fired 41 bullets and hit the West African immigrant 19 times, only to discover afterward that he was unarmed.

The four officers, acquitted Friday of second-degree murder and lesser charges by a jury in Albany, still face a departmental inquiry and possibly federal charges if Attorney General Janet Reno finds evidence that Diallo's civil rights were violated.

Sharpton's National Action Network is investigating what companies contribute money to the Patrolmen's Benevolent Association, which helped finance the defense of the four officers in the case.

Later this week, Sharpton will release names of the companies and will ask citizens to boycott the firms, his spokeswoman, Rachel Noerdlinger, said.

At St. Patrick's Cathedral, Auxiliary Bishop James McCarthy, filling in for an ailing Cardinal John O'Connor, told parishioners Diallo's death should cause people to "re-examine our own tendencies toward violence, toward fear, and perhaps toward prejudice — racial prejudice at that."

City Council Speaker Peter Vallone, speaking at Harlem's Bethel AME church, said that to make sure Diallo's death was not in vain, the police department needed to continue to make "fundamental, meaningful change, so that people aren't afraid that the police are going to shoot them."

Norman Siegel, executive director of the New York Civil Liberties Union, told 200 parishioners at a Congregational church in Queens that the Diallo case was giving new impetus to his group's proposals for police misconduct reform.

The key provisions of the reforms would make federal and state funding for local police contingent upon police meeting strict performance standards in community relations and would name a permanent special prosecutor to handle police brutality incidents.

In addition to seeking a criminal investigation to determine whether Diallo's civil rights were violated, Siegel said the NYCLU intends to sue the city on grounds that poor training and racial stereotyping led to the shooting.

Hillary Rodham Clinton urged

New Yorkers not to let the verdict divide them. She said the case underscores the need for a police force reflective of the city's ethnic diversity and for community policing.

Whatever the result of a Justice Department inquiry, "We must reach across those lines of mistrust and division and join to ensure that no tragedy like this ever happens again to anyone's son or daughter," she told several hundred people at a national conference of Dominican-Americans at City College of New York.

Clinton did not mention her opponent, Giuliani, who has been a main target of protesters in the Diallo affair. Giuliani's campaign spokesman, Bruce Teitelbaum, later criticized Clinton as uninformed.

"Mrs. Clinton obviously is unaware that New York City recently spent over $10 million on a new recruiting program designed to create a more diverse police department (and) ... the new police class will be the most diverse ever," Teitelbaum said.

The Rev. Calvin Butts, pastor of Harlem's Abyssinian Baptist Church, urged his followers to vote against Giuliani, saying the mayor had failed to thank him for urging calm in the wake of the Diallo incident a year ago.

"I'm not blaming Giuliani for pulling the trigger but for creating a climate that's divisive," Butts said in a telephone interview. "And I'm not calling for calm. I think black people ought to be agitated, they ought to be active."

Teitelbaum questioned the reverend's motives, saying he had hugged Giuliani at an interfaith service soon after the shooting, and "now he is exploiting Amadou Diallo's death for partisan political reasons."

Thousands of Mozambicans stranded after river flood

By MIKE COHEN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SAVE RIVER VALLEY, Mozambique — Helicopters plucked more than 1,500 people to safety Sunday as swollen rivers swept away almost everything in their paths in Mozambique.

Many more people gripped to whatever high ground they could find as waters continued to rise in the Save and Limpopo rivers. They have been stranded for a week and desperately need food.

Groups of people huddled on tiny patches of land stretched out their arms to plead for help from one of only two rescue helicopters in the Save area. A lone man on the roof of a straw hut pointed his fingers to his mouth and rubbed his stomach.

Officials refused to speculate how many people already have been swept away in the vast area along the banks of the Save (pronounced sah-VEY) in central Mozambique.

"There's massive destruction along the Save River. It's taking everything in its path — homes, villages. There are people stranded in trees and on homes. A lot of people are getting killed," said David Schaad, a World Food Program spokesman.

UNICEF's Ian Macleod estimated between 5,000 and 10,000 people were stranded in the area.

About 3,000 more were marooned in southern Mozambique after the Limpopo River burst its banks.

The known death toll in Mozambique and neighbors South Africa and Zimbabwe reached 200 from flooding in the last week.

Police said Sunday that at least 33 people died and 20 were missing after a bus was swept off a flooded bridge two days earlier in northeastern Zimbabwe. Twenty passengers had survived.

Torrential rains began drenching southern Africa three weeks ago, and then Cyclone Eline roared through last week. As the remnants of the cyclone raced back to the Indian Ocean, a new storm system was developing off the coast of Mozambique and expected to hit Monday.

In the Save valley, South African helicopters hoisted people aboard and dropped them a short distance away on slightly bigger raised patches of earth. With the nearest refueling point 125 miles away, rescues were going painfully slowly.

Journalists who flew 10 miles up the river mouth saw up to 1,000 marooned people.

One helicopter hoisted a woman and her baby aboard from the remains of a hut. Pigs, goats and cattle waded through the muddy water.

Rescue pilot Chippy Pretorius said he had rescued 320 people, and had seen one human body and many dead animals in the water.

Board approves smoking proposal

■ Ordinance now goes to Manhattan City Commission.

By NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An ordinance limiting smoking in many of Manhattan's restaurants and drinking establishments was approved Friday by the Riley County Board of Health.

The ordinance, which prohibits smoking in any place where food is prepared or served, will be put forth to the City Commission. The proposal exempts businesses with physically separate areas designated specifically for smoking that are equipped with independent ventilation, and Class A clubs.

Class A clubs include those that are operated by a non-profit social-fraternal or war veterans' club, such as the American Legion. They are exempt, except when open to the public, said Chuck Murphy, director of the Riley County Health Department.

He said the ordinance is needed because it addresses a prominent health issue in the Manhattan community.

"Smoking caused more disease and disability in this community than any other risk factor we've looked at," Murphy said. "We've done a risk appraisal for Riley County for two years, and from the study we see that the control of smoking can promote health, prolong life and reduce health care costs more than any other single action we can take."

He said the fact that they have received many letters and complaints from Manhattan residents saying they can't go into certain establishments because of the levels of smoke helped prompt their desire for a non-smoking ordinance.

The proposal was approved by the board 10-1 and is now being passed to City Commission for review.

Commissioner Ed Klimek said the ordinance is not yet on the commission's agenda, but actions have been taken by city staff members to research this type of ordinance and what it entails.

"I think it's a good thing to do, a healthy thing to do, but we'll have to craft it the right way to benefit the city," Klimek said.

He said the ordinance would not go before legislative vote until it was researched thoroughly from all aspects.

"It's a good thing for the community, which is why I think the health board would pass it on so readily, but we have to

Concerns of alumni addressed

■ Greek Affairs adviser criticized, supported in meeting Monday.

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Support and criticism of K-State's greek system and adviser was voiced Monday night by fraternity and sorority alumni.

The meeting was a forum for ideas, criticisms and support for the greek system and not a decision-making body, Mike Goodpasture, Interfraternity Council president, said.

One of the concerns of the alumni was the evaluation of Greek Affairs adviser Barb Robel.

David Fiser, Kappa Sigma Alumni Association president, said he disagreed with the current evaluation process of Robel, which only involves the IFC president and Panhellenic Council president.

He said the evaluation process should include alumni.

"Alumni invest many hundreds of hours and thousands of dollars to maintain our chapter houses and provide the opportunity for our undergraduate members to participate in the greek system," he said.

This was also a concern of Charles Hostetler, Sigma Alpha Epsilon house corporation president.

Golf course lot for sale

By TANNER EHMKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The construction for a miniature golf course in Aggieville has been put on hold.

K-State baseball coach Mike Clark said plans for building a putt-putt golf course in the lot between The Fulton Store and the Speedwash Laundry have been postponed due to financing problems.

"A financial backer pulled out," Clark said. "Unfortunately, I don't make enough money to fill the void."

Rusty Wilson, owner of Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon, put the lot up for sale or lease two weeks ago. Clark said there is no time-frame of when attempts at constructing the course might resume. He has decided to wait until this summer to help with future plans for the lot.

"Right now, I'm giving 100 percent to baseball," Clark said. "I'm just focusing on winning games and helping the players."

The miniature-golf course was not going to be a large money maker, Clark said. The investor who pulled out had another great opportunity come up. Unfortunately, he was a main investor. As a friend of the financial contributor, Clark said he understood the position he was in.

Fellow Manhattan businesspeople were not surprised at the fall-out of putting a miniature-golf course in the middle of Aggieville.

"I thought it would be pretty different to have family entertainment in Aggieville," said Kevin Fateley, president of Wildcat Creek Sports Center, who also offers miniature golf. "Most of the business for miniature golf is in the evening hours. And you know what kind of business goes on in Aggieville in the evening."

Fateley said he was not surprised that the miniature golf course was put on hold because of the surrounding businesses. There were a number of businesspeople who said it would not come to a reality, Fateley said.

"I wasn't sure they could have pulled it off with that kind of atmosphere," he said.

Wilson bought the empty lot at the 1100 block of Moro Street in Aggieville on Feb. 8, 1999, after a fire had destroyed Club Karrington, Adventure Travel and Greek's Pizzeria in a 1998 fire.

Army ROTC cadet Sean McCaffery, senior in finance, serves a hot chicken sandwich to Bruce Reed, senior in electrical engineering, Monday north of the K-State Student Union. Members of K-State's Army and Air Force ROTC teamed with the Union for the cookout that commemorated the last episode of the M*A*S*H series, which aired Feb. 28, 1983.

ROTC offers cookout to honor 17th anniversary of series finale of hit TV show

PHOTOS AND STORY BY MIKE SHEPHERD

For $3.50, Bruce Reed figured eating lunch in the ROTC tents in the north lawn of the K-State Student Union on Monday was a good deal.

After all, the cadets were serving hamburgers, potato salad, beans, cookies and a drink.

"And they even have chicken," Reed, senior in electrical engineering, said.

Monday marked the 17th anniversary of the last episode of "M*A*S*H," titled "Goodbye, Farewell and Amen." This television series from the '70s and '80s documented life for a military medical unit during the Korean War.

As a tribute, the food court assistant supervisor Tiffany Morris thought it would be a good reason to move lunchtime outside.

"Last cookout, we had 156 people stop," she said. "We're hoping ROTC will draw more people."

By 2 p.m., Morris said they probably served 130 people.

Morris said the Union tries to have cookouts on a regular basis when the weather is nice. This was the first for this semester, but it hopes to have one more between the Mardi Gras and Cinco de Mayo celebrations.

Cadet major Dustin Phillips, senior in sociology, said the 160 cadets who make up K-State's Air Force and Army ROTC units are more about community service programs than what some people think.

"Most students see us, and we are just a bunch of guys in green uniforms — that all we want to do is fight and go to war," he said. "We'd rather deter war."

Because of war and the people who fought and died in it people of the United States are free, Phillips said.

"We don't look back on it everyday, mostly at remembrances," Phillips said. "It's important to know who's given me my freedom and rights."

"Sometimes people need to be reminded of it."

As a reminder, the food was served out of a tent. Another tent was set up with military paraphernalia, including cots, guns and radios.

Among the tents, a bamboo cage lined with prisoners' of war dog tags housed cadet colonel Doug Haberstroh, senior in sociology, who was playing the part of a POW.

Considering he was able to keep all his clothes on, didn't have to wear chains and wasn't sitting in a mud puddle, his conditions weren't that bad, Stephen Duran, junior in management, said while standing guard.

"This is the reason we're here," he said. "When you're in school you don't realize people are dying for your freedom."

"We should be thankful for that."

As for Reed, a nine-year veteran of the U.S. Air Force and current member of the Kansas Air National Guard, it brought back some pleasant memories.

"I used to watch that show all the time," he said. "Me and my buddy in the Air Force would tune in every night at 6:30 for the reruns."

Leapers celebrate true birthday once every 4 years, improvise other 3

By CRISTINA JANNEY AND BRIAN CLARK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Michelle Buccigrossi, McKenzie Reifschneider and Amy Nelson are not your average college students.

Buccigrossi and McKenzie will be celebrating their fifth birthdays today, and Nelson will be celebrating her sixth.

All were born on a leap day.

"Not a lot of people in the world born on this day," Buccigrossi, sophomore in elementary education, said. "I think it is cool."

Leap days were created to balance out the calendar. The earth takes 365.24219 days to revolve around the sun. That means an extra day needs to be added to the calendar every four years.

Reifschneider, sophomore in biology and pre-med, said she liked the attention she has received for being a leap baby.

LEAP DAY FAST FACTS

- People born on leap day are known as leapers.
- This is the first leap year in 400 years to start a century.
- One of every 1,461 people is born on a leap day.
- There are an estimated 200,000 leapers in the United States.
- There are an estimated 4.1 million leapers worldwide.
- Julius Caesar adopted the leap-year system.
- An extra day is added to February every four years, except for years ending in 00 — unless the year is divisible by 400.

"Every four years, it is something unique that makes me stand out," she said.

Buccigrossi said that when she volunteered as a Big Sister in Salina, Kan., her hometown, her little sister thought it was neat that she was older than Buccigrossi was, she said.

Reifschneider wants to be a doctor and joked that she could be practicing at age eight.

Buccigrossi said she takes advantage of her tender age.

"When I do something stupid, I blame it on my age," she said.

Her friends are good-natured about her age, said Buccigrossi, a member of Kappa Alpha Theta sorority.

"If I do something dumb in the house, like the time I fell down the stairs, their comment was that I probably wasn't very coordinated because I was 4," Buccigrossi said.

She said she will always be a kid at heart.

"I go to the park and swing," she said.

When Buccigrossi was younger, her mother said Michelle had a hard time understanding why there wasn't a day for her birthday. Her family tried to give Volcano erupts. LEGAZPI, Philippines — Belching a column of ash and molten rock four miles high, Mayon Volcano erupted again Monday, forcing scores of nearby residents to grab their clothes and cooking pans and run for their lives.

Glowing red lava shot like fireworks into the sky. There were no immediate reports of casualties after the explosion, which experts said was the most powerful since Mayon began erupting Thursday.

The initial explosion Monday was followed by lightning and continuous rumble, said Ernesto Corpuz of the Philippine Institute of Volcanology and Seismology.

Mayon also emitted pyroclastic flows — superheated clouds of volcanic ash that travel up to 50 mph and can instantly incinerate anything.

People should not venture back into the prescribed danger zones near the volcano, Corpuz said.

The volcano is in Albay province, about 215 miles southeast of Manila.

In Mabinit village, scores of men, women and children fled, carrying pans, clothes and other belongings after seeing molten rocks and ash hurtling down Mayon's slope, news photographer Nelson Salting said.

More than 47,000 people were evacuated from nearby villages, but some have returned in recent days to check their houses and farms, despite warnings by officials.

In nearby Legazpi city, motorists stopped on roadsides to take pictures, while residents who hadn't been evacuated climbed on rooftops and cheered as the volcano erupted.

The repeated explosions indicate that magma still is rising to the dome of the 8,100-foot volcano, and that volcanic activity could continue for up to a month, officials said.

The volcano has been showing signs of unrest since June, spewing ash-laden smoke in the sky several times last year, but causing no injuries. An explosion in September forced more than 5,700 people to flee their homes.

Mayon's most violent eruption, on Feb. 1, 1814, killed more than 1,200 people and buried an entire town in volcanic mud flows. An eruption in killed more than 70 villagers in February 1993.

Former pitcher will retain lawyer after court decision

A motion filed Monday morning during a continued arraignment for Brett Reid allowed the former K-State baseball pitcher to retain his attorney.

Missouri attorney Daniel Franco has been on hand as attorney during past proceedings for Reid, who faces charges of attempted rape and sexual battery. However, a district court judge ruled that Reid's Feb. 14 arraignment was invalid because Franco is not licensed to practice law in the state of Kansas.

Manhattan attorney Bruce C. Barry, who appeared with Reid during the Feb. 14 arraignment, is now serving as co-counsel. Barry said he made a motion to the court as a Kansas attorney in order to allow Franco to practice in Kansas.

Motions such as this one are standard procedure whenever an out-of-state attorney wishes to practice in another state, Barry said.

"Today's only outcome is that the court granted this motion to allow Mr. Franco to be a counsel in cases that relate to Brett Reid," he said. "His appearances in a Kansas court are limited to Mr. Reid's cases."

Barry said although he will be involved in Reid's cases until their resolution, Franco will remain Reid's lead attorney.

No decision was made on Monday as to whether a preliminary hearing that took place on Jan. 13 was valid.

"I've ordered a transaction of the proceeding, and the court will make a decision if that preliminary hearing stands," Barry said.

A preliminary hearing to take place at 9 a.m. March 30 is regarding a second allegation for Reid, which Barry said he has not had a chance to review.

Former KU student murders parents, commits suicide

HOYT, Kan. — A relative is suggesting that parental pressure might have led a man to shoot his father and mother at their home in rural Jackson County.

Also, the son had been in trouble with the law several times in recent years, area law-enforcement agencies said.

Speculating on Ilesh Abhir's possible motives was Dr. Sudha Paranjpe, his aunt. Law enforcement officials believe Abhir killed his parents before igniting their house and taking his own life.

Snehalata and Ashok Shimpi were found shot to death Feb. 18, hours after a standoff that began when a Jackson County sheriff's deputy was shot and wounded outside the Shimpi home.

The deputy was checking on Snehalata, who had been absent from work for two days. An investigation revealed Abhir might have shot his parents long before the deputy arrived on the scene.

In an interview with The Times of India, an English newspaper published in Bombay, Paranjpe said Ilesh was undergoing treatment for depression last summer, when she spent four months with the family.

She said she couldn't rule out the possibility that Abhir might have murdered his father.

"The relations between the father and son were deteriorating with every passing day, and there were many altercations between them," she said. "Though it is tragic, there is a very real possibility that Ilesh actually killed his parents."

Paranjpe also said parental pressure to succeed academically might have led to the stress between father and son.

She said there is a disturbing trend among families from the Shimpis' homeland to try and force children to achieve in American schools.

"Our Indian parents are putting far too much pressure on their children to excel in that country," Paranjpe said. "The sooner they change the better. Otherwise, the Shimpi tragedy could be repeated in other homes."

In 1996, Abhir was arrested for driving under the influence of alcohol while a student at the University of Kansas.

Abhir also pleaded no contest in Shawnee County to driving 74 mph in a 55 mph zone in 1996 and driving 52 mph in a 20 mph zone in 1997.

In August 1999, Abhir was issued a summons on a misdemeanor charge of criminal use of weapons after he tried to enter the Shawnee County Courthouse with a knife.

Census should not deter students' voting

If you plan to be a student at K-State next fall, fill out the State of Kansas 2000 Census Adjustment Questionnaire on KATS.

K-State's census is a mandate from the state of Kansas, and the state is ordering full compliance — meaning 100 percent of K-State students must fill out the census.

The state census will be added to the federal census.

The way the state of Kansas and K-State ensure every student will complete the census is by requiring it be done in order to enroll for the upcoming fall semester.

Other ways K-State will make sure you take the census is requiring you to do so before you are able to vote in the Student Governing Association's annual election on campus.

In fact, once you access KATS online, you will be forced to complete the census before you can go any further.

Assistant dean of student life Scott Jones said it will take just a few minutes to complete the census, so don't procrastinate.

The state of Kansas might take action against K-State if the census does not reach 100 percent participation.

Please note that the census is quite harmless, and it doesn't affect student tuition, income tax rates or mailing addresses.

You can list either your address in Manhattan on the census or the city in which you grew up.

Take a few minutes and fill out the census.

Get it out of the way now so you don't have to deal with it later on.

Most importantly, do not let the few minutes it takes to fill out the form deter you from casting your vote in the upcoming elections.

I was just wondering if the library could maybe clear out a little extra space and move all of these sleepers into a public nap room.

Do you know what is sad? When the library's 24-hour study room is louder than a home basketball game.

Hey, Scott Roney. It's time to quit beating your Bible. It died last semester.

I will not vote for a new student body president unless one of them vows to bring Spinal Tap to Manhattan.

I would just have to say that yesterday's Rodeo Queen picture is the best front page I've ever seen on the Collegian.

My wellness doesn't begin until the sixth drink.

I love it when SGA elections come around. I just hope it doesn't rain, because then I won't know who to vote for.

I think the greek system needs to be left alone, because none of the independents have a problem partying at the all-U's.

I hope the student body president hopefuls know that if they really want to let us know what they're all about, they need to be visiting the residence halls and talking to us one-on-one.

I'd like to congratulate Jason Heinrich and Gabe Eckert on all they've accomplished this year on their campaign ... whew, that's a good one.

Robel and Asbury could really save some money on moving by splitting the cost of a U-Haul. Just a thought.

Does anyone else think the campus looks like a Candyland board game because of all the chalk everywhere?

Spinal Tap was just a movie about a rock band — namely, about KISS. They were never a rock band.

There are only three things in life that are important — fishing, fishing and fishing.

The Ebony Theatre this weekend was wonderful. Kudos to the entire cast and production staff. It was great.

march

Month offers opportunity to honor everything from health to women's history to frozen food

Cheer up, kids. We are on the brink of March.

March is derived from the word Mars, which was derived from the name of the Roman god of war (who provided the world with Cupid, after an adulterous affair with Venus), which brings a calendar of respite for the college student.

The entire month is in devotion to several important causes.

American Red Cross Month is by far one of the most important. Keep in mind that, although donating blood does not result in a quick cash advance following the donation, you might save a life, and that generally is defined as subtle heroism. If nothing else, it makes you feel elation both on a physical and moral level (plus, I think you almost always are given a cookie when you leave).

National Nutrition Month and National Chronic Fatigue Syndrome Month wrap up other health-related causes that March houses.

National Nutrition Month comes at a time of year when most of us students are thinking that spring is on the way, which means baring all in public. So we need to take control of our health. Defined in layman's terms: try to actually eat that fruit you buy with the best of intentions every week. Plus, that certain week of freedom from the university also is included in March and nobody wants to be feeling like death while on vacation.

Now, I know some college students decidedly suffer from Chronic Fatigue Syndrome. Generally speaking, this is in relation to that nap that likes to sneak up after "The Simpsons" ends. All I can say in a Dear Abby tone is get up off the flowered couch and go outside. I hear the rugby team practices at the east stadium on campus. It also is an ideal place to lay out for the females at K-State. Every gender gets the opportunity to take the initiative to get out.

March also brings us National Frozen Food and National Peanut Month.

Frozen food? I am sure that nobody reading this is aware of the concept, right? I myself tend to frequent the freezers of the grocery store when the fast-food drive-thru is way too long. I am pretty sure that peanut ice cream bars are sold in the frozen section, but those might not sit too well with your new devotion to good nutrition. Solution: eat some peanuts at the bar so you do not go home and order pizza; buy frozen vegetables and really eat them instead of allowing freezer burn to set in.

On a more academic note, March is National Poetry Month and Women's History Month.

How to advocate these two causes you ask?

Read some poetry. Try something in relation to a female poet such as Emily Dickinson. I know she is a household name and might seem mainstream, and the rumors of her writing are that she does not make sense. While that is true in some cases of her work, I think dear Emily just might surprise some of you out there. I will give you a little hint about how to go about reading her: the bee equals a male, the flower equals a female (namely, Emily). Try it, for Emily Dickinson was by no means a prude woman.

The first week of March is Alcohol

Awareness Week. Since Student Governing Association elections are coming soon, this might be a good time to bring up some Safe Ride issues. Read about how the candidates are feeling on this particular subject. Do this instead of going to the bar.

The second week of March is National Procrastination Week. That probably is all I need to say about that one. Get that paper done.

The third week of March is Brain Awareness Week. In support of brain disease and research, this week also might be utilized as a means for enhancing your own with some knowledge. See a historical movie. Read the entire menu at a restaurant. Go to class?

The last week of March is American Chocolate Week. If you're going to Colorado for spring break, I recommend the Rocky Mountain Chocolate Factory. If going anywhere else I recommend a Watchamacalit from a convenience store. Just remember to not give it to the dog.

Other ways to celebrate March can be done at your own discretion.

TARYN FORT

KELLY FARRELL/Collegian

Remember: Mardi Gras is celebrated from Liechtenstein to Monaco to New Orleans. St. Patrick's Day is on the 17th (a Friday this year) and also the beginning of spring break. The first full moon of March is on the 19th, followed by the 24th, which is a day to celebrate anything you want, according to calendar experts.

I encourage you to advocate something this month besides your addictive habits. If it tears you inside to do something of positive value, keep in mind that April 1 lies directly after March 31, and we all know what activities that day has in store for us.

Gunter, Kelso vow to wipe away problems plaguing toilet paper in campus restrooms

■ Slogan aside, tandem says issues truly valid.

"We Care About Your Ass" is not only about toilet paper and push/pull signs on doors, although we feel these are significant issues other candidates have failed to address.

The campaign is about finding out what you want.

We will get softer toilet paper so you won't cringe with every painful swoosh.

We also will get door signs so that everyone on this campus doesn't look like a total moron walking into doors.

To this, we say "No more." Since we do care about your asses, we want to know what you think about issues pertaining to K-State.

This is why we plan to have polls set up on KATS about those issues.

We also will attain new ways to communicate what is going on in the Student Governing Association to the student body. We want to make sure all students are aware of what SGA has plans of doing. Improving the programs that already are set up to communicate with the students will be one of our main goals, and we will make sure everyone knows about these programs.

We have a lot of students asking if we are serious.

Hell, yes.

We're not only serious, but we are going to win.

We know with our main platform being toilet paper, everyone might not take us seriously, but it's a good place to start. Sure, the new quilted toilet paper will be the best new addition in many years, but we're not stopping there.

There are other issues, such as parking — but that is an easy fix.

Some candidates are talking about advisers, and — although we have no problems with our individual advisers — you might.

We will see to it this situation is fixed so there are no problems in affixing your education.

After all, that is why you're here.

Everyone made the right decision by choosing the best college in the nation — now we are asking you to make another great choice by voting for our asses because we care about yours. We are not spreading lies around campus like has been done before.

We, too, want a better university — the best university — and to do this, we need your help.

In closing, we hope that you vote.

Hopefully for us, but at least for someone because we don't feel the entire student body is represented by SGA.

Toilet paper, signs, parking, advising, lights, campaign finance, student polls, transcripts on KATS and another licensed pilot to the K-State-Salina campus is what our campaign is all about.

We feel these are all important issues, but that is not what our campaign is about — it's about you.

It's all about you because "We Care About Your Ass."

Hall, Hoskinson promise to return focus to students' issues if elected

"Students for Students."

That's what the Hall-Hoskinson ticket is all about. We believe it is time for the Student Governing Association of K-State to get back to issues that affect each student everyday. It is time to turn the emphasis away from politics and put the spotlight back on relevant student concerns.

Concerns on which we want to focus in the coming year are built upon the premise that each student is entitled to the best educational experience possible at K-State. Three main topics we will address are advising accountability, GTA improvement and providing a strong student voice to our Kansas Legislature and Board of Regents.

First, when students come to this university, they expect to receive help from their advisers when they need it. Nevertheless, situations occur where students don't feel comfortable talking to their advisers. Also, some students find their advisers don't take time to get to know them, and communication between adviser and student breaks down.

We believe accountability of advisers is the solution to these problems. Our advisers not only should be evaluated on their teaching and research but also on their aptitude as advisers. The movement toward this accountability will be one of our main focuses.

Second, when students sit down in a classroom, they expect to receive quality instruction. GTAs play a large role in the education of K-State students, and, although the expectations of GTAs are increasing university wide, the quality of GTAs is slow to mimic this increase.

Our goal is to illustrate this expectation to the administration of K-State and encourage them to utilize the resources already on campus to improve GTAs. We want to see a standardized training program for GTAs in all departments, more awards to recognize the efforts of outstanding GTAs and increased wages for GTAs to encourage a greater number of applicants from which the departments may choose.

Third, we want to provide strong and accurate student input on student issues in the Kansas Legislature and Board of Regents. This year, the state legislature cut university funding by 1 percent across all colleges, and to compensate for this drop in funding at state schools, the regents have raised tuition for next semester.

When issues like this come up, it is the responsibility of the student body president and vice president to accurately and effectively represent student views. We are committed to making sure the people who control funding, tuition and other university concerns hear how students feel.

The Hall-Hoskinson ticket is unique.

We have issues that are feasible and within the scope of the offices of student body president and vice president. We stand for keeping student fees as low as possible. We believe student government should focus on student issues.

Most importantly, we believe SGA should get away from politics and get back to what it is intended to be: "Students for Students."

HALL HOSKINSON

Hall, Hoskinson plan to create closer SGA-student relationship

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Positions with K-State's Student Governing Association should no longer focus on the art of politicking, said Steve Hall, junior in agricultural economics, and Ryan Hoskinson, senior in education.

Instead, those elected to SGA should concern themselves with best representing the students who placed them in office, Hall said.

"The student body president and vice president are elected by students, so they should represent student interests," Hall said. "The president shouldn't side with the administration on every issue."

This fight for student voters has become the core of the pair's "Students for Students" campaign, with which Hall and Hoskinson said they plan to put student government to work for the campus.

The first of three main platform issues Hall and Hoskinson have chosen to concentrate on is that of student advising. Hall said the need for accountability among faculty advisers would lessen the chance of students being left behind by the system.

"How many times have we heard people complain that they only spent five minutes with their adviser?" Hall said. "Staff members should not only be evaluated on how they teach and how they do research. They should be evaluated on what they do for the students they are supposed to be helping."

The key to creating a better university-wide advising system would be to support organizations such as the University Task Force for Advising, Hall said, which was created solely to enforce policies set by the Faculty Senate.

"The Faculty Senate has a set of guidelines for advisers, but it should be known to the deans of each college that this is what we expect from faculty," Hall said.

A second platform issue for the pair's campaign, graduate teaching assistants, focuses on the GTAs role in the classroom. Hoskinson said GTAs new to teaching encounter interaction problems and find it difficult to communicate with their students.

"There needs to be a better orientation for GTAs before putting them in a classroom," Hoskinson said. "It differs from department to department, but orientations for GTAs can last anywhere from three days to a week. Spending the full week with GTAs could give them a certain amount of instruction on how to effectively understand their students."

Educational funding is the third item addressed by the Hall and Hoskinson campaign. With student voices involved in government at the state level, further increases in tuition perhaps could be avoided, Hall said.

"There needs to be someone to tell legislators that the increase that begins in the fall requires us to work seven to eight hours more a week to pay for it," he said. "That money could have paid for a month of food or half of my books for a semester."

While these three issues form the Hall and Hoskinson platform, another "Students for Students" issue is that of SGA membership. Talk of diversifying the student governing staff has, in the past, involved the possibility of creating special seats for members of minorities, but Hall and Hoskinson both said this is not a plausible solution.

"We recognize that there is a definite problem in that the composition on Student Senate doesn't mirror the composition of the student body,"

Hall said. "Of course, another problem is that the composition of those that run doesn't exactly mirror the student body, either."

Hall said he would suggest a forum to provide what he and Hoskinson think is the most important part of K-State government: student voices.

"We would invite people to say, 'This is why I feel too intimidated to run for student government,'" Hall said. "We need to make more people choose to run."

Presidential hopefuls aim to ensure accountability, consistency of academic advising

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Accountability in academic advising has become a major concern for student body presidential hopeful Steve Hall and running mate Ryan Hoskinson.

This focus on responsibility in advising would perhaps aid K-State students on their paths to graduation, Hall said.

"There are freshmen with dual majors or specialties that can identify with the problem of bad advisers," he said. "These are the people that need extra help getting into the classes they need so they can graduate on time."

Hall and Hoskinson both said if the Student Governing Association were to support organizations such as the University Task Force for Advising, the quality of academic advising could be enhanced.

"The task force is developing action plans for advising, and we should see something from them in April," Hall said. "We need to support organizations like this and listen to their suggestions for improvement."

The University Task Force, formed during Tracey Mann's term as K-State's student body president because of efforts by Faculty Senate and Provost Jim Coffman, is made up of faculty members and students whose primary job is to recommend modifications of the advising program, Chairman Bob Burton said.

"We have a charge delivered by the provost that has to do with enhancing advising," Burton said. "Right now, we're working to come up with a recommendation on how to evaluate advising."

Burton said surveys of student advisees could help the task force add to the list of what students should expect from their advisers.

"Advisers should work with students on things such as goal setting, short term and long term," he said.

The responsibility for advising lies with the deans of each college, said Ray Hightower, chairman of the academic standards and advising committee and assistant dean of the College of Engineering.

However, Hightower said each department within the colleges establishes the procedures of the advising process and evaluations.

"The departments provide training and materials for advisers, records of students and determines what courses they should take in math and science areas," he said.

Hightower said the College of Engineering, as well as other colleges on campus, provide guides for staff members to aid in the advising process and ensure the same quality of advising for all students.

Student body presidential candidate Andrew Maenche, junior in electronic journalism, said advisers need to spend more time with students to build a better relationship.

"With advising, you're just a serial number. No one knows you personally," Maenche said. "Maybe if advisers had more than one meeting per semester that lasted longer than the 15 minutes, it might reassure the student."

However, an impersonal relationship is not always the fault of the adviser, said presidential candidate Jared Teach, junior in public relations.

"It's kind of a 50-50 shot as to how effective advising is, and it's kind of up to the student," Teach said. "To me, advising can be better."

Advising has got a good base, and I think we don't take advantage of it enough."

Teach also said the next student body president should work on making advisers more accessible to students' problems, perhaps with the addition of extra advisers to avoid overloading staff members.

"The program could use GTAs or even older students to let people know what classes are needed to graduate. They could help get the younger students on the right path," Teach said.

Maenche said he agreed that adding advisers could improve the quality of the program.

"The welfare of the student could be increased along these lines," he said.

Golf team places 2nd in Florida

■ 4 players finish in top 10 as team falls from 1st place.

By DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After being tied for first place after day one at the Northern Invasion Collegiate, the K-State men's golf squad fell behind six strokes to tournament champion Illinois State, to finish second in the meet.

Despite the host Wildcats firing a team total of 287 Sunday at the Orange County National Golf Club, in Orlando, Fla., the squad shot a 293 on Monday to fall to the Salukis.

Sophomore Bryan Milberger, after shooting a career-best 3-under-par 69 on Sunday, finished second in the three-team field with a two-round total of 141.

Milberger's 69 on Sunday is also the first under-par round of his career.

For the meet, Milberger's finish was four strokes behind the champion, Illinois State's Stuart Anderson.

Had Milberger won the tournament, he would have become the first Cat to claim medalist honors since Sears won the Wildcat Intercollegiate on Oct. 10, 1998, at the Manhattan Country Club.

"He's just a breakout waiting to happen," K-State head coach Tim Norris said of Milberger. "He's been playing well, and it has carried over into this tournament."

Complementing Milberger's strong performance, Sears sat in a tie for second place after firing a 1-under-par 71 Sunday.

However, Sears' first outing of the spring was spoiled after he shot a 77 Monday to drop him into a tie for 10th place.

Sophomore Scott McNeely shot an even-par 72 on both days of the tournament to finish in a tie for fourth.

Sophomore Matt Williams was the only other Cat to finish in the top 10 for the meet, firing a two-round total of 147, good for a seventh-place tie.

Missouri also represented the Big 12 Conference in the meet.

The Tigers shot a team-total of 583, three strokes behind the Cats in the tournament standings.

Leagues in search of coaches

■ City to hire summer help for 1,000 students, 90 teams.

By JEFF CALDWELL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Spring soon will arrive and area fields will become filled with children.

Jim Colley is the recreation superintendent for the city of Manhattan, and he oversees the recreational leagues.

"My main job is to provide a well-rounded, quality recreational program for anyone between the ages of 3 and 93," Colley said. As part of his job, Colley works with four other supervisors to organize leagues throughout the year in sports such as basketball, soccer, volleyball, baseball and softball.

Colley also works to provide competitive opportunities for adults, seniors and the disabled.

The spring and summer months are especially busy for his department.

"We have programs offered for all age groups," Colley said.

Even though the city recreation department is not officially affiliated with K-State, both organizations do benefit from the interaction they share with one another.

The city employs almost 500 people, including some K-State students during the summer months to help with general work, but a great number of those hired assist with sports leagues in some capacity.

"We like anyone who is young and would enjoy working with kids," Colley said.

An immense number of opportunities are available to interested K-State students. These jobs range from ground keeping to coaching a soccer team.

Zach Stone, a recent K-State graduate, will be coaching a youth soccer team for the second year in a row.

Stone's team is one of the 90 in competition that include more than 1,000 young athletes.

"It's great to coach a group of kids who, even though they are young enough to still want to play for fun, want also to be competitive and learn the fundamentals," Stone said.

Colley said the variety of athletic leagues sponsored by the parks and recreation department of the city is not something taken lightly.

"The key is quality," he said. "Somebody taught you and took the time to spend with you when you were that age, and we're just working to keep that going."

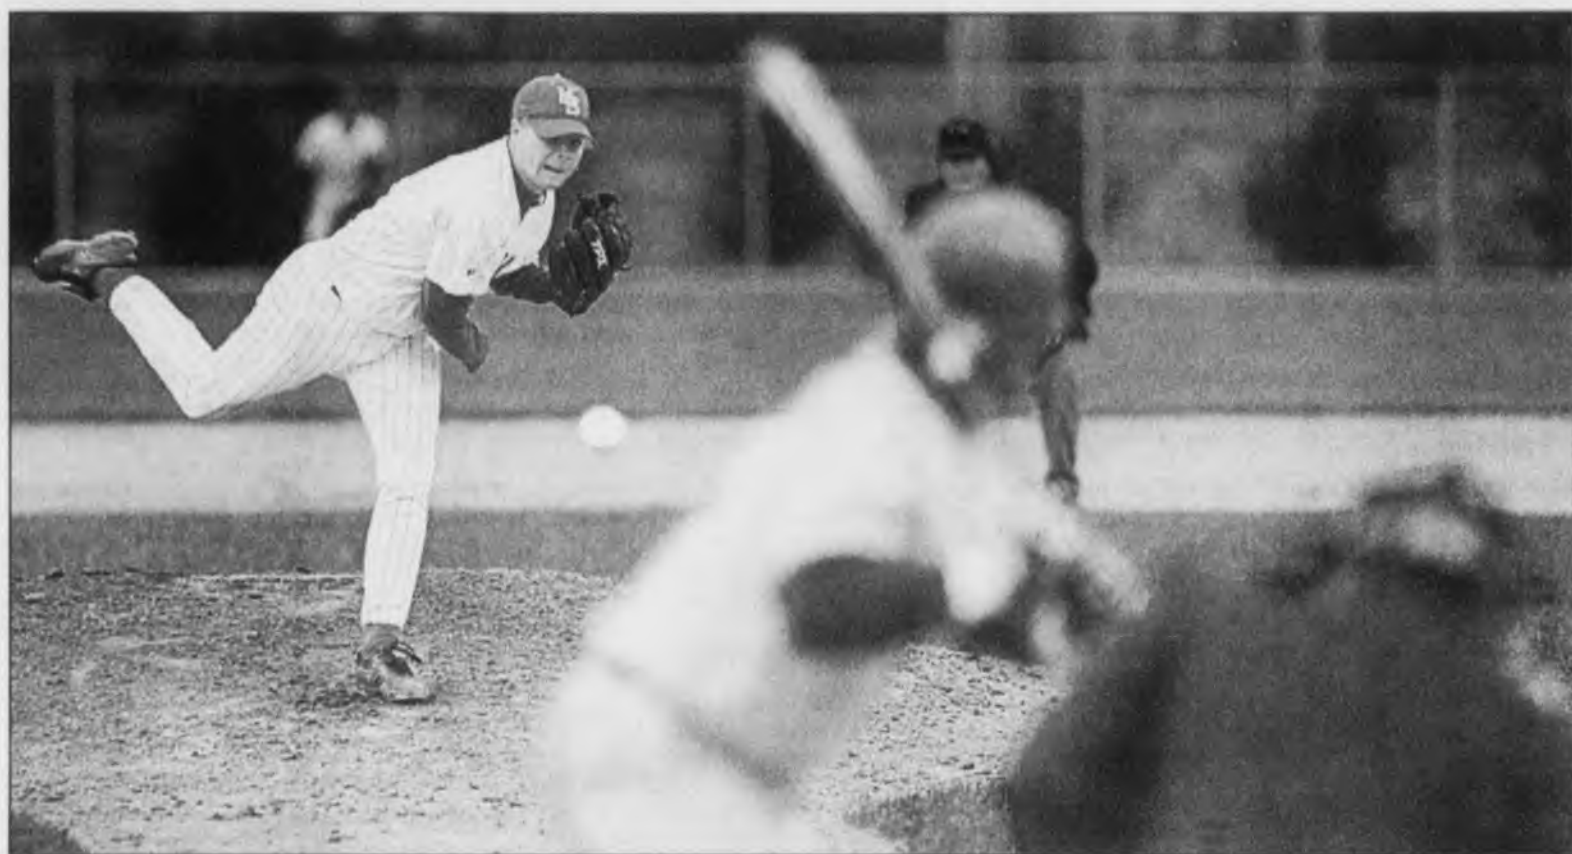

Stone said he enjoys coaching a group of young soccer players.

"It is a great way to share my knowledge of the sport and hopefully, the kids learn a lot, but have a great time also," he said.

Colley said the department still is looking for coaches and assistants for youth leagues and summer day camps.

K-State pitcher Jason Wells delivers a game pitch at Wayne Norvell Field in Manhattan last year. K-State takes on Southern Nazarene at 2 p.m. today at Frank Myers Field.

Looking AHEAD

BY MIKE VIETTI

Wildcats hope to improve pitching, turnaround season against Southern Nazarene

The K-State baseball team will look to end its seven-game losing streak when it takes on Southern Nazarene at 2 p.m. today at Frank Myers Field.

The Wildcats (2-7 overall, 0-3 Big 12) are coming off of a weekend series in which they were swept by Texas A&M.

"We just didn't have a lot of things go right for us over the weekend," K-State head coach Mike Clark said.

K-State gave up a total of 35 runs to the Aggies in the three games. Senior Jason Wells and sophomore Luke Robertson each started a game for K-State and left the mound with the Wildcats leading but took the loss in each case because of inherited runners who scored.

Freshman Derek Ver Helst took the other loss, giving up all nine runs in Saturday's contest before being ejected from the game in the second inning for hitting a Texas A&M batter.

"Starting-pitchingwise — Ver Helst struggled," Clark said. "Wells and Robertson didn't pitch great, but they competed well. We just have to get our starters deeper into the game."

From the plate, K-State belted out seven hits in the first game, nine in the second and 12 hits in the final Sunday.

K-State hitting coach Robbie Moen said the teams hitters still aren't where they need to be.

"It's kind of like running a marathon. You just need to keep getting a little better each day," Moen said. "Some days you'll have great strides and cut a few seconds off your previous mile time, but then there's other days when you're going to run into a good pitcher, which is kind of like running up hill.

"Our guys are getting better — they understand the physical side of hitting and what we're working on now is the mental side of it," Moen said.

Junior outfielder Ben Oleen and junior catcher Graham McAllister improved their chances of becoming regulars with their performances in the series.

Oleen went 7-for-11 during the three game stretch, while McAllister, after stepping up to the plate twice all season, finished 4-for-8 against the Aggies.

Clark said he plans to use the competition against NAIA Southern Nazarene as a chance to get many of his starters ready to prepare them for this weekend's series at Oklahoma.

"We've still got a lot of problems to answer," Clark said. "This game is just part of the puzzle."

Strawberry reaches final straw

If Darryl Strawberry had a nickel for every time he was given a second chance, he probably could afford to pay the salaries of his New York Yankees teammates. Not to mention the salaries of the Mets, Braves, Reds, Rangers and Dodgers.

But instead of collecting nickels, it appears that Strawberry is collecting suspensions and lawsuits.

And what a collection it has become.

This past week, Major League Baseball announced that on Jan. 19 Strawberry had tested positive for cocaine.

Again.

Unfortunately, Strawberry is no stranger to trouble. His past troubles include allegedly assaulting his wife, threatening her with a gun, striking a woman with whom he lived, committing tax evasion, refusing to pay child support, testing positive for cocaine on at least two different occasions and getting caught soliciting a prostitute.

I'll admit, I'm an advocate of giving second chances, but Straw has run out of lifelines, and Major League Baseball must make its "final answer" swiftly and decisively.

In a time when baseball is trying to restore its image as the national pastime, Strawberry's continued drug addiction is especially damaging.

Allowing an alleged habitual drug user and wife abuser to return to the playing field is an insult to the game of baseball and its fans.

When former baseball commissioner A. Bartlett Giamatti banned Pete Rose from baseball for gambling, he did so to uphold the integrity of the sport he held in high esteem.

He told the media that "No man is superior to the game."

Giamatti's words are no less true now than they were when he banned Rose.

But Strawberry's continued neglect for the law is being met with a mere slap on the wrist by baseball officials.

It appears that when Major League Baseball Commissioner Bud Selig makes a final decision on the issue, Strawberry will be suspended for this season, but he will be allowed to apply for reinstatement after 120 days.

Considering Strawberry's tumultuous career, it is easy to understand why Selig would want to issue such a lenient punishment.

Straw lost several seasons to debilitating colon cancer and its effects.

He struggled with a difficult marriage and with the intense media spotlight that so often accompanies sports heroism.

But despite his misfortunes, Strawberry's behavior demands more than another light-weight punishment.

For the sake of the game,

Strawberry should not be allowed to play Major League Baseball again.

Despite his long and admirable battle with colon cancer, Strawberry can not be put above the game.

Strawberry has always been a wonderful baseball player, but far too often he gave in to the temptations that accompany the pressure of fame.

No man is perfect, but the absence of perfection has never been an adequate excuse for addictions that are far too human.

For the sake of the game of baseball, Bud Selig should ensure that Strawberry's mistakes do not go overlooked.

For Strawberry, his latest drug test serves as the final straw for a baseball career that went unfulfilled.

No one ever will know just how good Strawberry could have been had he not suffered through cancer and substance abuse.

During the peak of his career, he commanded the respect of the fans, the media and his opponents. He was respected on the field and adored off of it.

While that adoration will never be lost, it cannot be allowed to cloud the vision of the fans or of Bud Selig.

Strawberry cannot be handled lightly, or we will risk damaging the memory of Giamatti, the faith of the fans and the integrity of a sport that means so much to so many.

Track team readies for nationals

■ 6 athletes qualified for nationals; Oklahoma meet could send 4 more.

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's crunch time for some K-State track and field athletes.

The Cats already have qualified six athletes for the NCAA national indoor meet March 10 and 11.

K-State head coach Cliff Rovelto said the Cats also have the opportunity to qualify four other athletes this weekend in a meet at the University of Oklahoma. Rovelto said it is kind of a last-chance meet.

"We have four kids who will be competing down in Oklahoma," Rovelto said. "All of these athletes have a shot, but they will need to improve to get into the meet."

The K-State athletes who will be competing this weekend are Aaron Lockett, Terence Newman, Kimela West and Tamel Sisney.

K-State athletes who have qualified for nationals are Amy Mortimer, Rachel Woods, Amanda Crouse and Korene Hinds in the distance-medley relay.

Other athletes who will be competing at nationals are Erin Anderson in the pole vault and possibly the high jump, and Anna Whitham in the weight throw. Hinds also has qualified in the mile, and Mortimer has qualified in the 3000 meters.

It has been an indoor season filled with success for the women's team, Rovelto said.

Rovelto said the new power rankings will be released today, and the team will be ranked in the top 10 in a variety of national rankings.

"The only thing the athletes have control of is their own responsibilities," Rovelto said.

Rovelto said the athletes who contributed at the Big 12 meet could have been aided by those who missed the meet because of various reasons, reasons Rovelto said included both injuries and eligibility.

"You can never be satisfied with the low finish, but the reality is that the people who were there did a good job," Rovelto said. "It is more of a reflection on some guys who didn't take care of business and not with the guys who competed."

However, a new evaluation process, that neither Fiser nor Hostetler knew about, will be implemented in the 2000-2001 evaluation period. This evaluation process will include feedback from colleagues within a staff member's primary organizational unit.

Hostetler said he hadn't had time to look over the new process so he didn't know if it was adequate.

A reason Hostetler and Fiser said they recommended a new evaluation process was because of some of Robel's actions.

Fiser was concerned about a statement in a report by Robel titled "A Higher Standard." In it, Robel states in bold writing that "Fraternity members at K-State will be in an environment that fosters all that is good about fraternity life, and fraternities that are unable to provide that environment will not be allowed to continue on this campus."

Both Fiser and Hostetler said they found these statements threatening to the existence of fraternities.

"This statement is very vague and undefinable as stated in relation to what is an environment that fosters all that is good about fraternity life from one who has never been a member of a fraternity," Fiser said.

The report also contained a statement from Robel and Bob Kerr, student activities adviser of University of Northern Colorado, that said "Kudos for the response to Acacia," among other positive responses from other IFCs about the Acacia decision.

Acacia was removed from campus for five years in spring 1999 for hazing. Fiser said it is sad when something like that happens.

"We do not believe it is a call for high fives and rejoicing," he said.

Sorority alumni also had concerns about the greek system.

Martha Kellstrom, Kappa Delta house corporation board vice president, said she was concerned about the formal recruitment process at K-State because of the unequal distribution of women in the sororities. She said she would like Panhellenic Council to make sure K-State is following all of the National Panhellenic Council guidelines concerning recruitment and the quota total system. Kellstrom said she wasn't insinuating guidelines aren't being followed, but that it would be good to examine them.

Kappa Kappa Gamma membership adviser Marty Vanier agreed with Kellstrom.

"My issue of concern is that of the unequal distribution among sorority members such that we have some chapters that are extra large on the order as in our case, versus chapters that are struggling for survival because they cannot reach quota during formal rush and are therefore struggling financially," she said.

Amy Bayer, Alpha Zeta Delta corporation board president, said new member classes are so big in some chapters that there isn't room for them all to live in the chapter house. But due to quota requirements, chapters are forced to take more women than they can house.

"There's just no way that we have the collegiate personnel to outreach that many pledges," she said.

Support for Barb Robel and the greek system also was quite vocal.

Mike McCree, Sigma Nu fraternity alumnus, spoke of the many awards and honors Robel had received as well as the greek system. "Something is working right here at Kansas State University, and the one constant element of our greek system success is our greek adviser Barb Robel," he said. "The worst thing that Barb has done is follow her job description."

Delta Sigma Phi chapter adviser Jack Taylor said Robel had done a wonderful job.

"We've got to evaluate ourselves and look at what we're doing and look at our weaknesses instead of going around and pointing fingers at other people," he said.

IFC and Panhellenic Council went into closed meeting after the meeting and will issue a response today.

Hostetler also invited alumni to a closed meeting on March 15 to develop a task force to work with IFC, Panhellenic Council and Robel.

discuss its impact on the entire community," Klimek said.

Researching the ordinance, he said, included obtaining feedback from the public and from the businesses that would be affected.

"Businesses can't dictate how you do things, but I definitely want to hear their voices," Klimek said.

He said many questions would be addressed to the businesses, such as how feasible creating a separate smoking area would be and how the ordinance would affect their establishment.

"I think this could be a split thing," he said. "There will be pros and cons in the general public. Those who smoke will definitely have a voice on it, and so will those who don't smoke."

Student Body President Jason Heinrich said he was pleased with the approval by the board of health. Though the proposal was not required to go through the board of health, he said he felt it needed to.

"It's definitely a step in the right direction," Heinrich said. "If the board wouldn't have endorsed it, it probably wouldn't have gone anywhere."

Heinrich said he thinks it is his role to address issues that concern students, which is what prompted him to address the issue of smoking.

"I feel good about what we've done," Heinrich said. "It's an important health issue, and I just happen to be in favor of it."

Heinrich said he hopes the proposal will reach the commission's agenda before summer.

"We're really not talking about any specifics now," Klimek said. "I think we're at the very edge of this and need to do a lot of research on it, seeing where we can go with it and getting a lot of input."

her bigger celebrations every leap year. On her 16th (fourth in leap years) birthday, her parents threw her a party with frogs as the theme.

"We tease her a lot," Lorean Buccigrossi, her mother, said. "It is more of a fun thing than anything."

She said Michelle was due to be born in the first part of March. She said she didn't think she would have a leap-year baby.

Strangely enough, Reifschneider is not the only person in her family who was born on a leap day. A cousin was born on a leap day four years after Reifschneider. Her great-grandmother was also a leap-day baby.

"Normally I celebrate on the 28th, but this year is more special," she said.

As for this year, Buccigrossi said she didn't have big plans for the her leap birthday.

"Besides going to class, I don't have anything to do," she said.

Nelson, graduate student in veterinary medicine who celebrates her 24th year today, said she always knew she had an unusual birthday, but it never set in until her aunt sent her a card in 1984 wishing Nelson a "happy second birthday."

"She sends me cards like that every four years," Nelson said. "I also get gifts that match the number of birthdays I have had, such as dolls and little toys meant for 4- or 5-year-olds."

Nelson also said she was teased in school because her classmates said her birthday didn't exist.

Since her birthday doesn't come but once every four years, Nelson chooses to celebrate it on Feb. 28 of non-leap years.

"I could claim amethyst as my birthstone because purple is my favorite color," she said.

Nelson said many people don't seem to understand when she tells them the date of her birthday. She said some people tell her it doesn't exist.

The odds of being born on leap day are 1 in 1,461. Despite this, Nelson said she has never met anyone else with a leap day birthday.

Because this is the year 2000, Nelson said she plans to have a big celebration.

"I plan on celebrating the whole week," Nelson said. "I'm going to have a party, and Tuesday, I'm going out and buying a diamond and amethyst ring for turning six."

Riley County Division 1 District Judge Paul E. Miller conducted the ceremony for Manhattan residents Teresa Moreno and Timothy Wilson. This year, Judge Miller has conducted five ceremonies.

Local justice performs couple's wedding ceremony

Teresa Moreno said she received the most romantic Valentine's gift of all — a wedding ring. Hers was the only wedding performed on Valentine's Day at the Riley County Courthouse.

Manhattan residents, Timothy Wilson and Moreno said they agreed Valentine's Day was the perfect day to join themselves together in marriage.

Wilson and Moreno met on a blind date in 1994 and have been together ever since.

Lori Coleman, court clerk, said one wedding ceremony on Valentine's Day is unusual. It seems that the whole year has been slow for courthouse matrimony. Wilson and Moreno's ceremony was only the 15th to be performed at the Riley County Courthouse this year.

She said courthouse weddings aren't for everyone.

"It's kind of bizarre," Coleman said. "They just call in and say 'I want to get married sometime this week.'"

Following a full day's work, one of three district judges, Judge Paul E. Miller, Judge David L. Stutzman or Judge Meryl D. Wilson, will stay late to officiate the marriage ceremonies.

Miller presided over the Morena-Wilson ceremony. He called the bride and groom into the courtroom and took his place behind a polished oak podium.

"Marriage is a bond of unity," Miller said. "Love and loyalty is the foundation to a happy and enduring home."

Moreno said after living with Wilson for six years and raising their children together, she felt confident they had a good foundation.

"After six years, I don't think our relationship will change much. It will probably get better," she said.

Moreno's aunt and maid of honor, Gloria Mirelez, said it was time for the couple to be married.

"We've known him so long he's already family," Mirelez said.

The groom said he agreed.

"I think it's great. It's about time," Wilson said.

Mirelez, pulling from her 35 years of marriage experience, offered couples, whether they get married in a church or in a courtroom, some advice.

"You should never go to bed mad," she said. "You must let bygones be bygones."

TOP. Teresa Moreno holds her 14-month-old son Thomas Edward Wilson at the conclusion of her wedding ceremony. Timothy Wilson and Moreno agreed Valentine's Day was the perfect day to have their wedding.

LEFT. Teresa Moreno signs the marriage license in the presence of the judge after the ceremony. A marriage license is the document signed by both parties, which legalizes a marriage.

ABOVE RIGHT. Timothy Wilson's best man, Chuck Sanders, offers a vote of confidence to his long-time friend before the ceremony. Wilson commented that he only had been a best man one other time, and the couple still is doing well after 28 years.

With spring break on the horizon, many students are going to tanning salons to get their base tans before they leave for spring break vacations.

STUDENTS CATCH RAYS INSIDE

Despite popularity of indoor tanning beds, precautions should be taken for skin, eyes is in the air, and tanning salons are feeling the weight of it in their appointment books.

Kelly Whaley, manager at Sun Essentials, said this is the time of year when business starts to pick up.

"Business really picks up in February," she said.

Whaley said, it is important to protect the eyes when tanning, or damage could occur.

"We give people goggles to wear, but we can't monitor them and make sure they are wearing them," she said. "Some people think they are protecting their eyes by putting a towel over their face, but that doesn't work."

She said if the eyes aren't protected, cataracts could be a potential injury in the long run.

"The eyelids are very thin-skinned," she said. "When the eyes are burned, the retinas are injured."

Molly Shane, general manager at Sunkissed Tanning, said there's a lot of hype about tanning booths about whether they are good for you. She said it is important to tan in relation to the color of a person's skin.

"Moderation, just like everything else, is the key," she said.

There are two types of Ultraviolet rays in regard to tanning — UVA and UVB. Reita Currie, registered nurse at Lafene Health Center, said UV rays penetrate through the skin. They stimulate the production of melanin in the skin, which gives the essence of color.

Whaley said she thinks the Ultra Bronze bed, which uses UVA rays is the best way to tan.

"The UVA ray gives you a deeper tan," she said. "It doesn't burn you, like the UVB ray can."

Shane has a different opinion. She said UVA rays do not set up defense in the skin against the outside sun, therefore the skin is more likely to burn.

"The Ultra Bronze bed is just a cosmetic tan," she said.

Shane said she thinks UVB rays are the safest.

"Although the UVB ray will burn if you're overexposed, it stimulates melanin in the skin, so when you go outside, your skin has more defense to both rays," she said. "When melanin is built up, it thickens the skin to create a defense to the natural sun so you don't immediately get burned."

There are ways to enhance your tan and to make the most of your tanning bed experience. Lotions are used to develop the base tan, Whaley said.

"Lotions are used to moisturize the skin, so you can tan faster," she said.

When looking for tanning lotions, Whaley said there are a few ingredients that will help resist aging now and down the road.

"Aloe helps in anti-aging because it moistens the skin," she said. "Wrinkles come from dry skin."

Pharmacists suggest treatments for flu, cold

BY SHANNON DELMEZ
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Although it might have felt like the flu bug hit harder than usual this year, it didn't.

Barry Farvis, a pharmacist at Barry's Drug Center on Poyntz Avenue, said this flu season was pretty standard.

"It's about what it has been in year's past," he said. "I haven't noticed a real epidemic of any sort, but we have some medications that are available to shorten the duration."

Farvis said two drugs, Tamiflu and Relenza, have heightened interest in the treatment of flu this year.

According to the Doctor's Guide at www.pdgroup.com, these drugs are designed to treat all common strains of influenza and to reduce both the duration of illness and severity of symptoms. The drugs are to be taken within the first two days of the first signs of the flu.

"There has been quite a bit of press and advertisements concerning those two," Farvis said. "I think that it just heightened awareness of flu, but I really haven't seen it any worse this year."

Despite the regularity of this cold and flu season, business at local pharmacies has increased.

"Anytime there is a cold and flu, the amount of prescription volume definitely increases," Jason Kramer, a pharmacist at Dunne's Pharmacy, on Claflin Road, said. "Every year is a little bit different. This year we haven't been hit as heavy as previous years, but we have had a significant increase."

Kramer said certain over-the-counter medications, such as decongestants and antihistamines, as well as antibiotics, have also gone up in sales.

Another over-the-counter drug that has sparked some interest is a nasal spray called Zicam.

"I've had a little trouble getting excited about it just because it's an herbal homeopathic type thing," Farvis said. "I'm not sure all the studies are there to substantiate the claims. But, they claim that if you use it, the cold will stop in one day. That's a little hard to believe."

Farvis also said the weather has affected the flu virus this season. Typically when the weather is not cold, the cold and flu viruses are more prevalent, he said.

"If it gets real cold, it has a tendency to kill some of those bacteria and viruses. It just never got that cold, so they are hanging around," Farvis said. "And now it's gotten warm enough that you are throwing in a little bit of allergies. That compounds the problems for people with bronchial problems."

Kramer said he has seen a lot of sinusitis, bronchitis and ear infections, which are typically associated with the cold and flu season.

"Whether it's part of it or related to it, or a person's immune system gets down, while they are fighting a cold, they may be a little more susceptible to those types of infections," he said.

Farvis said if students have cold and flu symptoms, it is important for them to see some type of health professional.

"That could be a physician," he said. "That could be a doctor or a pharmacist."

fighting the flu

Spotting the viral infection:

Flu symptoms include fever, cough, nasal discharge, headache, muscle aches, stiffness, shortness of breath, chills, sweating, fatigue, malaise, congested nose, sore throat, clammy skin, nosebleed, nausea, vomiting, elbow pain, appetite loss and abnormal tastes.

Catching the flu:

There are three types of influenza virus. All are spread from person to person by inhaling infected droplets from the air. Type A usually is responsible for the large outbreaks and is a constantly changing virus. New strains of Type A virus develop regularly and result in a new epidemic every few years. Types B and C are fairly stable viruses. Type B causes smaller outbreaks, and Type C usually causes mild illness similar to the common cold. The incidence is seven out of 1,000 people.

Staying healthy:

Flu shots are recommended annually for people who are 65 years of age or older, anyone with chronic heart or lung conditions and those living in institutions. The vaccine has a 60 to 70 percent success rate in preventing infections. For older individuals who have been exposed to the virus, the drug amantadine may be given to prevent them from actually getting the flu. This also can be used for treatment.

Equestrian team newest addition to K-State club sports

By JUSTIN SCHUSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This academic year has brought a new baseball field, a renovated food court and a football stadium expansion.

Less visible but also among these changes has been the addition of an equestrian team to the realm of club sports.

Participating on the equestrian team involves showing horses at competitions, said Teresa Douthit, head coach of the horse show team.

Participants demonstrate their ability to handle horses by performing different maneuvers in the ring. These include things such as walking, trotting and loping, which is the fastest rhythm movement for horses in competition, Douthit said.

The competitors are judged on body position, horse handling and execution of a pattern.

Douthit said members of the equestrian team do not bring their own horses to competitions. The host school provides the horses as well as equipment like bridles and saddles.

Participants' experience levels determine which class they will compete in. This means that competitors do not need any experience to participate on the team.

Although the team consists of only women, Douthit said it is open to anyone at K-State.

"At the beginner level, the only requirement is that you have less than two years' riding experience," Douthit said.

She also said all participants must be full-time undergraduate students.

Competitors draw names from a hat to see which horse they will show, Douthit said. This is one challenging aspect of the sport, because the participants do not get to spend any time with their horses before the competition.

She said that while the horse's actions do not figure into the judges' decisions, they do affect the competitor's performance.

"You've got to be able to adjust to whatever," Douthit said.

Nichole Bredfeldt, sophomore in animal science, said it is difficult to show a horse you have had no experience with.

"You're not challenging just yourself. You've got an animal to work with," Bredfeldt said.

Douthit said the team formed last fall when Julie Wolf, assistant coach and faculty representative of the horse show team, approached her with the idea after doing the necessary research and information gathering.

"It took us a couple of months to organize," Douthit said.

The team then joined the Intercollegiate Horse Show Association.

"We didn't want a huge team to start with because we didn't have the resources," Douthit said.

She said the team mainly used word-of-mouth recruiting.

Wolf said participation has not been a problem for the team.

"We've got two to three students that come by every day wanting to be a part of our team," Wolf said.

Even though this is just its first year at K-State, the equestrian team has enjoyed some success.

"At virtually every show we've been to, we've had a high point or reserve high point rider," Douthit said. "At the Texas A&M show, K-State took only six competitors and finished as the reserve high point team."

Bredfeldt went to the Texas A&M show. She said she was proud of the team's performance.

Cheryl Messenger, junior in animal science, said the team performed well against other equestrian programs.

"I think we did a lot better than a lot of people thought we would do," Messenger said. "We have a lot of good talent on our team."

Douthit said the biggest problem facing the equestrian team is a lack of funding for horses to practice on.

"Luckily, there have been some very generous donors," Douthit said.

For practices, the team borrows horses from the rodeo squad and some members of the Manhattan community.

The team is sponsoring a horse show clinic on April 16 to help raise funds for its program, Douthit said.

Douthit said students wishing to participate on the team should simply come talk to her. Because the season is already over, it is too late to join this year.

However, the team will have an organizational meeting sometime next fall for students wishing to compete. Students will have to pay around $20 to join the team, Douthit said.

Members might also have to pay some road expenses depending on the show.

"It doesn't take a huge financial obligation," Douthit said. "I would like to come up with enough money so that the girls won't have to pay for any of their expenses."

Teen charged with death of boy; small town mourns

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

OSKALOOSA, Kan. — A 15-year-old boy was charged Monday in the weekend shooting death of a 13-year-old, authorities said.

Police said Dakota Back of Oskaloosa died Sunday morning at a Lawrence hospital.

Authorities are not releasing the name of the 15-year-old, who was charged with second-degree murder and other drug-related charges. He remained in custody Monday evening.

The Kansas Bureau of Investigation and the Jefferson County Sheriff's Department are investigating the case, KBI special agent Scott Teeslink said.

Teeslink said dispatchers received a 911 call at 2:55 a.m. Sunday from a home in Oskaloosa, where they found the victim.

Dakota was taken by ambulance to Lawrence's Memorial Hospital, where he was declared dead.

Teeslink said the 15-year-old was taken into custody at the scene, where investigators were executing a search warrant Sunday.

Dakota was the second teenager shot to death in less than four months in the northeast Kansas town of about 1,100 people.

The partially disrobed body of Zetta "Camille" Arfmann, 14, was found Nov. 8 buried under dirt, trash and pieces of plywood in a garbage ditch near Oskaloosa.

She had been shot at least three times, once in the back of the head.

The girl's brother-in-law, Floyd Bledsoe, 23, has been charged with first-degree murder, aggravated kidnapping and aggravated indecent liberties with a child.

Thousands rescued in flood in Africa

By MIKE COHEN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MAPUTO, Mozambique — Rescuers plucked thousands of people from trees and rooftops Monday, but many others were left behind and forced to spend another night on precarious perches above rising flood waters in Mozambique. Officials said thousands have died in the deluge.

Maj. Louis Kirsten, a spokesman for the South African military, said helicopters rescued more than 3,000 people Monday, including everyone in immediate danger along a particularly hard-hit area of the Limpopo River.

Michele Quintaglie, a spokeswoman for the U.N. World Food Program, said thousands more were still at risk.

"We're a long way from being able to rescue everybody," Quintaglie said. "There will be thousands of people left behind tonight. These people will be on their own to get through the night."

While there was no precise death toll, Quintaglie said it was certain that the number of dead was in the thousands. Other aid workers said the toll would continue to climb, especially as people begin dying of flood-borne diseases during the next few weeks.

The Mozambican government estimates more than 200,000 people have been left homeless since torrential rains hit the impoverished African nation three weeks ago.

South Africa said it would send three more military helicopters Monday to join the five already in operation. Even with the new aircraft, it could take days to rescue everyone.

"Not by a long shot is this over. It seems like the water is still rising," Quintaglie said.

Tom Harrer, an adviser to the government's disaster agency, said many people refused to heed the warnings and were unprepared for the extent of the floods, which are the highest levels that have been recorded.

On Sunday, a wall of water 6 feet high hit Chokwe, a town of about 40,000 people about 125 miles north of the capital of Maputo, submerging it in a matter of hours.

Flight crews said a lake of water about 18 miles wide surrounded Chokwe and that the Limpopo River, which normally was less than a half mile wide, was about 6 miles across near Chokwe.

Paul Tyndale-Biscoe, a water engineer who was in Chokwe when the flood hit, said he saw human bodies and cattle carcasses being swept along the raging flood waters. A South African pilot said the flood also destroyed about 150 tons of food aid at the main depot in Chokwe.

Quintaglie said helicopters Monday concentrated on rescuing people stranded in trees near Chokwe — whenever possible first saving those holding on to children.

"In some places, people had been hanging onto branches overnight with children on their backs," she said.

On Sunday, rescue crews watched helplessly as buildings collapsed moments before helicopters could reach them, dumping scores of men, women and children into the swirling waters.

The World Food Program said 55,000 people needed to be evacuated in the southern Gaza province and that 30,000 needed to be moved from the Save River valley farther north.

The National Disaster Management Center said the situation was critical downstream from Chokwe at Xai-Xai, the provincial capital of Gaza. It said roads on both sides of the city of 130,000 had been washed away and the city had run out of fuel and had no power.

Thousands of people huddled together on tiny patches of high ground in both the Limpopo and Save regions often raced each other to win seats on arriving helicopters. Many people ferried to higher ground had to be rescued twice as flood waters rose.

Meanwhile, more water was headed downstream into Mozambique's Cahora Bassa Dam from its western neighbor, Zimbabwe, which Sunday released billions of gallons from its overflowing Kariba Dam.

Zimbabwe's Civil Protection Unit said Monday that at least 80,000 people were left homeless by floods in the east and south of that country. Officials said the number could be far higher, since many of the affected areas were inaccessible. Floods had swept away bridges and roads and rescue services lacked aircraft for aerial surveillance.

In Botswana, 60,000 people had been left homeless by floods caused by four weeks of heavy raining, said Dineo Mogwe, chairwoman of the National Disaster Management Committee. Eight people had died.

Lafene privilege fee leading election issue

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Lafene Health Center's privilege fee is up for review, and this year might see a change. Office visits to Lafene always have been free, but due to rising health-care costs, Lafene might have to start charging for office visits.

Ryan Walker, privilege fee chair, said the committee just had its first meeting last week concerning Lafene so nothing has been decided yet. He said it probably will be three to four weeks before the decision is made and finalized.

Walker said there are two sides to the decision of implementing a user-fee at Lafene.

"If we go that route, it would put the responsibility on the student who uses it," he said.

On the other hand, Walker said if Lafene goes to a user-fee, it might discourage students from going to Lafene because they don't have the money at the time.

Sixty-five percent of Lafene's $4.2 million budget is supported through privilege fees, and this includes covering office visits.

"Privilege fees help undermine the cost to the patient," Lannie Zweimiller, Lafene director, said.

Zweimiller said he would like to see an increase in the allocation of the privilege fee to combat the rise of health care funds rather than charging for an office visit.

"The advantage of privilege fees covering office visit costs is you can come in as often as you want," he said. "You may not have money later in the semester."

Zweimiller said he didn't know how much revenue a user-fee would generate because, if implemented, it could deter the number of students coming in.

However, Zweimiller said if an office-visit charge is implemented, it still would be much less than any other physicians in Manhattan.

About 30,000 students a year come see a physician, Zweimiller said.

Lafene has tried to reduce costs over the years, Zweimiller said. It has cut back on hours and personnel costs and found ways to operate more efficiently.

"I feel that Lafene services are well used by the student body, so I don't want to recommend reduction of services," he said. "My obligation is to provide the best health center we can, and I think we're doing that."

Lisa Morris, junior in pre-med and international business, said she would prefer that office visits stay free, but understands the need for more money.

She said if a charge has to be implemented, she would like to see it balanced with an increase in the allocation of privilege fees to keep the cost lower to the students.

"There's no benefit of going to Lafene if it's too expensive to go," she said.

Jake Schwartz, senior in criminology, said he wouldn't mind if a user-fee was implemented.

"Only if the quality of care they give is going to increase," he said.

Schwartz also said the charge wouldn't deter him from going to Lafene.

"As long as the fees aren't too outrageous," he said.

Zweimiller said he hopes students understand that it's not him vs. the Privilege Fee Committee. He said they're both working together to come up with the best solution for the university.

"It's your school service, and we're administering it to you," Zweimiller said. "We operate with student money, and it's your local hospital."

"It's not easy to come up with a solution, because it's an expensive service," he said.

making IMPROVEMENTS Memorial Stadium to receive new turf due to project funds

By KELLY EVENSON

KELLY GLASSCOCK/COLLEGIAN

Stacy Hurst, senior in accounting, jumps a water hole on the track in the East Stadium on Thursday afternoon. Renovations to the track and football field are in the planning stages.

A new track, natural grass or artificial turf eventually will refurbish Memorial Stadium after 30 years of no inter-collegiate games.

Jerry Carter, director of facilities planning, said renovations to the track and football field at the stadium are being planned. He said changes were needed because of the KSU Alumni Association's decision to build its new facilities at the south end of the stadium.

"Since the Alumni Association has taken the opportunity to place its new building there, we have been looking at reconfiguring and upgrading the track," Carter said.

Karen Shafer, director of communications for the association, said the association has been working with the university on renovation and has made a financial commitment to the project. She said although the project is not in conjunction with the new association building, there is a lot of interest in the new track.

"We envision its use for both students and alumni," Shafer said. "We want to have it upgraded for a game-day type of atmosphere for the students and for intramurals."

The track will be moved to the inside edge of the stadium, which will allow for a larger football field. The track will be rubberized and have a trench drainage system, while the field will have an automatic lawn system. About half of the estimated $300,000 cost of the renovations will come from the City/University Tax Fund.

Mark Taussig, university landscape architect, said the primary goal is to enlarge the football field for club sports. He said the field is setup for football, which is a much narrower space.

Taussig said the artificial turf that might be used looks just like grass and is what Memorial Stadium at the University of Nebraska has. However, he said the cost is a great deal more.

"Everything is still in its preliminary stages," Taussig said. "Once the whole project is completed, it will be a nice club sports area."

Carter said renovations to the field will allow for rugby, lacrosse, soccer and possibly ultimate Frisbee. He said he has been in contact with the architectural firm for the Alumni Association to coordinate the reconfigurations and has talked with intramural teams about the design for the new field.

"We have begun consulting with all the sports groups and involved them about what we are doing with the field," Carter said. "We are trying to get the project completed within the near future, but are waiting on the construction of the Alumni Association to begin."

Taussig said other possibilities for the project is lighting to allow for night games, and renovations done to both East

1st-grader kills girl at school

By RANDI GOLDBERG
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MOUNT MORRIS TOWNSHIP, Mich. — A 6-year-old boy pulled a gun from his pants and shot a little girl to death Tuesday in front of their horrified first-grade teacher and classmates.

One child said the boy loaded the gun with a single bullet and opened fire after the girl yelled at him for spitting on her desk.

"I don't like you," the boy was heard to have said to 6-year-old Kayla Rolland, who was struck in the neck and died a half hour later.

The boy, whose name was not released, was taken into the custody of the state child welfare agency after the shooting.

Prosecutors did not say how they think the boy got the .32-caliber gun, though they said it had been reported stolen in December and was in the boy's home.

Genesee County Prosecutor Arthur A. Busch said there might have been some sort of scuffle or quarrel on the playground between the boy and girl a day earlier.

However, a 6-year-old classmate told The Associated Press that Kayla had yelled at the boy because he spit on her desk and stood up on it. She said the boy "spit on people, he hit people and cursed and stuck up his middle finger," and did not like Kayla "because she was mean and yelled at him."

Regardless of the investigation, it might be impossible to bring charges against the boy, the prosecutor said, but someone might face charges for enabling the boy to obtain the gun.

Fund-raiser exceeds goal

■ Telefund sets new record, surpasses $1.2 million goal.

By NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

More than 1,400 students and 21,000 alumni worked together to set record-breaking pledge and participation numbers for Telefund 2000.

Telefund 2000 ended Monday night after a month-long effort to raise money for scholarships and educational programs at K-State. Its initial goal of raising $1.2 million was exceeded by more than $35,000.

"It's phenomenal," Gordon Dowell, director of annual giving, said.

He said the resulting sum of $1,235,174 was due to enthusiastic students, devoted alumni, a dedicated campus community and the support of the business community through prizes.

"Things worked out very nicely," Dowell said. "Almost every night, we had every seat filled."

Each of K-State's nine colleges was allotted different time slots throughout the month of February to call alumni and ask for pledges. The month began with K-State Salina and ended with the College of Architecture, Planning and Design. Each college allocates the money differently, but every college donates a certain percentage to student scholarships.

As a current recipient of a scholarship raised from last year's Telefund, Laura Dover, junior in elementary education, knows first-hand the benefits of the annual

Special tax fund fuels projects to benefit city, university

By TANNER EHMKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The City/University Tax Fund Committee was born in 1994. It was designed to propose projects that benefit both the city and the university.

K-State was not governed by the Manhattan City Commission until it was annexed on July 3, 1994.

Ron Fehr, interim city manager of Manhattan, said the committee was formed to help guarantee that the annexation would not be a hindrance to K-State or Manhattan.

"People have been very pleased so far with the outcomes of various projects," Fehr said.

The projects are funded, in part, from sales taxes and franchise fees on campus, which amount to about $300,000 to $350,000 per year. About $1.6 million has been accumulated for the recommended projects since the funding began in 1995.

Bill Muir, assistant to the vice president of institutional advancement, is the director of community relations for K-State.

"The committee is a buffer between President Wefald, who represents the university, and the City Commission," Muir said. "They make recommendations to the city about funding projects. The ultimate goal is to promote mutually beneficial projects."

He said one of the committee's ongoing projects is a University Gardens project. It will cost about $175,000 over a period of five years, Muir said.

"A lot of people ask what the purpose of the garden is," Fehr said. "There's a lot of real potential for a botanical garden. For students, it can be an outdoor learning lab."

The committee comprises nine members appointed by the mayor. Six of the members are citizens of Manhattan. Two students also are chosen by the mayor from a list of six suggested by the student

Mighty Fine Donuts closes due to lack of employment

Mighty Fine Donuts in Aggieville closed Saturday after nearly a year and a half of business.

Bob Leetch, owner of Mighty Fine, said the shop closed because of staffing problems that interfered with the production of the doughnuts.

"We needed people to work the nighttime hours, because that is when the doughnuts are made," Leetch said.

Leetch said most people who work night hours want to bartend or waitress to make more money, not make doughnuts.

"There was not enough of a job market for us to staff the store during the nighttime hours," Leetch said.

Mighty Fine opened in November 1998 and operated in conjunction with 42 different accounts, to which they sold doughnuts.

Leetch said the shop served doughnuts and soft drinks, but the problem was finding the type of people he wanted to work.

"We just had some problems with the quality of the products," Leetch said. "I was not able to find the type of people to make the type of product that I wanted."

Leetch said he is not sure what will open in the space that Mighty Fine occupied.

"I am sure something will go in its place, but I am not sure if it will be something owned by myself or someone else," Leetch said.

Cheryl Sieben, director of the Aggieville Business Association, said she would be unable to comment because she did not know any details of the closing.

Leetch said the closing was unfortunate, but it was something he just could not handle along with his other business, Lucky BrewGrille, also in Aggieville.

"We gave it a try, but it was not something that I was able to manage along with Lucky's," Leetch said.

Gifford quits morning show; Philbin stays after 15 years

NEW YORK — Kathie Lee Gifford surprised viewers of "Live with Regis &

Kathie Lee" on Tuesday by announcing she is breaking up the act, and apparently that is her final answer.

She said she is leaving the show this summer and ending her 15-year run as sidekick to Regis Philbin, who stuck by her through tabloid scandals, bad wardrobe days and endless talk about her son Cody.

"It's the right time," said Gifford, 46, whose contract ends in August.

Philbin asked if she was kidding and she said no.

Gifford, who recently performed a fill-in role in the Broadway musical "Putting it Together" and was guest host last week for David Letterman's "Late Show," said she misses singing and acting and wants to "spread my creative wings."

Philbin, 66, will continue without her, despite his busy schedule as host of ABC's prime-time game show sensation, "Who Wants to Be a Millionaire?" His query to contestants, "Is that your final answer?" has become a national catch phrase.

Philbin is signed to do the daytime show through the summer of 2001 and is expected to sign an extension that takes his prime-time success into account. The Hollywood Reporter said the deal is expected to earn Philbin $20 million a year.

He and Gifford first began working together in 1985 on the morning show, then aired only in New York City. It became syndicated for a national audience in 1988, and now ranks a solid fourth in the talk show derby behind Oprah Winfrey, Jerry Springer and Rosie O'Donnell.

Their light mix of celebrity chat and entertainment began each morning with Philbin and Gifford riffing on the day's news, or what they did the night before.

Gifford said that is part of what has driven her away. After years of talking on the air about Cody, 10, and her daughter Cassidy, 7, she does not want them as the subject of attention anymore.

"I no longer feel comfortable sharing the ordinary, innocent, everyday details of my family life, only to watch the tabloid media turn them into harmful, misleading and libelous stories," she said.

CLARIFICATIONS & corrections

There were two errors in Tuesday's Collegian.

The photo for the health question was of Carole Diamond. The question was answered by Carol Kennedy.

Kelly Whaley was misquoted in saying the Ultra Bronze bed is the best way to tan.

She said she did not have enough information to comment about the bed's effectiveness. The Collegian regrets these errors.

Election violation. Jake Worcester, student body presidential candidate, and Dana Pracht, vice presidential candidate, pleaded no contest to a Student Governing Association election code violation Monday.

They were sanctioned by the elections committee for chalking too close to an entryway in front of Umberger Hall.

"The course of action I had to take was to clean it up," Worcester said. "We were happy to take care of it and didn't mean to violate anything."

The SGA elections code states candidates can not chalk within ten feet of any doorway or building entry.

Travis Lenkner, campaign manager for Worcester and Pracht, said the chalking was just inside of the 10-foot line.

"We measured wrong by about six inches," Lenkner said. "We washed it off last night about 2 a.m."

Travis Morgan, elections chair, said because it was a minor violation, Worcester and Pracht did not receive a tough penalty.

"It wasn't too serious," he said. "We just wanted to set a precedent that we're not going to allow anything."

Lenkner said the pair worked hard to explain the rules to those helping with the campaign.

"We made a huge effort to inform our campaign crew about the rules. We had about 25 people helping us chalk and sign. We gave them all handouts and explained the rules," he said. "This definitely wasn't an intentional violation. It was just a simple distance mistake."

He said he did not think it would hurt Worcester and Pracht's campaign.

"I think people understand that we're trying to do our best to get our message out," he said.

"When you have so many signs and chalkings on campus, there's bound to be one mistake in there."

Morgan said only one violation at this point in the campaign is less than usual, but he said there seem to be fewer chalkings and signs than usual, too.

Maenche-Karimi campaign centers on searching for practical solutions

By TANNER EHMKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Drew Maenche and Ali Karimi say the Student Senate needs new blood with leaders who keep the students in mind. They said it's time the Senate starts finding practical solutions for real problems.

"They argue really distant ideas, not really listening to students," Maenche, junior in electronic journalism, said. "They argue personal issues for their resumes."

The two candidates run their campaign with the slogan "Everyday solutions for everyday students." Although they are running a low-budget campaign absent of shirts, buttons and banners bearing their name and campaign slogan, they spend their nights going out on the town to meet people and to listen to their concerns.

"Raising money takes time away from listening to others," Maenche said. "We're staying close to the grassroots campaign to go right to the people."

Other large-budget campaigns reflect that, Karimi said. Raising $2,000 to $3,000 for a campaign is not what the election is about.

"Even if we had that kind of money, we'd still rather go to the people," Karimi, sophomore in social science, said. "We're the most accessible people running. I think. Meeting people is better than selling them a shirt."

Other candidates seem distant from students and out of touch, they said. Maenche and Karimi said they argue issues that affect everyone, including themselves.

Their platform includes legitimate concerns for campus, not far-fetched ideas, such as banning smoking, they said.

Tuition increases affect all students, Maenche said. As tuition is increased, there should be more progress.

Instead, programs are being cut, organizations are not receiving funds, and some people are getting pay raises when the money could be used elsewhere.

A mass-transit system for students is another one of the pair's main concerns. A parking garage would not solve the parking problem, Maenche said. The garage is only a short-term fix for a long-term problem, and K-State will continue to have record enrollments in the future, he said.

If the university were to build a parking garage, finding a place to put it would be a problem. Maenche proposes laying down the plans for a transit system soon and planning the framework.

Maenche said Hale Library needs tremendous improvements as well.

Students and faculty are not able to obtain the resources for their research or personal needs, he said. Many students have complained about the lack of books, resources and journals that they need but are unable to find in Hale.

"Our library is one of the worst in the Big 12," he said. "We're falling down the Big 12 ladder."

Maenche and Karimi also are concerned about improving the graduate teaching assistants' capabilities.

There needs to be a stronger review of graduate teaching assistants, they said. K-State needs to help them with verbal articulation and teaching capabilities.

They teach important classes, such as upper-level math and science courses, Maenche said, but K-State is providing a second-rate education.

"There are a lot of really intelligent GTAs. Some just need to improve their English just a little bit," Karimi said. "But we don't want to discriminate against them just because they can't speak English well. They may have a lot to offer."

Maenche and Karimi said they're not trying to win on name recognition, but on the issues they stand for and what they can do for students just like them.

"We want people to know where we're coming from and who we are," Maenche said. "We're doing this to get things done."

Candidates push GTA performance standards to forefront of presidential platforms

By TANNER EHMKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Some student body presidential candidates are saying that K-State needs to toughen its screening of graduate teaching assistants because a number of GTAs are not proficient enough in English or their subject matter.

"If you have a GTA that is a hindrance to communication, you're distressed," said Ronald Downey, assistant provost of planning and analysis. "But I don't see any major changes in the future. The Board of Regents has been very pleased with what we've been doing so far."

All GTAs are evaluated on the Graduate Record Examination, their grade-point average, letters of reference and a statement of personal interest, Downey said. In addition, foreign students must pass a written English test to measure their reading skills to be admitted. Then they must pass an oral exam, the SPEAK test, administered through the Department of English. The standards are set by the Kansas Board of Regents, Downey said.

The departments screen their own GTAs, he said. Three weeks into the semester, students evaluate the communication skills of the teacher.

"There have been both native English-speaking and non-native English-speaking students removed because of their lack of communication skills," Downey said. "Whenever the issue is raised, the finger is pointed at foreign students."

Steve Hall, junior in agricultural economics, and Ryan Hoskinson, senior in math, say students have had a difficult time in various classes because they could not understand the teacher.

"There are a number of GTAs who don't know how to relate the subject matter," Hall said. "This needs to be addressed."

Hall proposed two solutions to help students get better qualified GTAs. The standards are up to the department, Hall said. The university needs to set higher standards in the way they are oriented and tested on their ability. GTAs also should go through a mandatory teaching class and a semester of English if they are not fluent enough, he said.

"K-State is also at the low-end of the pay scale of comparable schools," Hall said. "When we can't afford to give our GTAs decent pay, we lose the quality."

In order to increase funding for better teachers, the school had three main options: reallocating current funds, increasing tuition or receiving more funding from the Kansas Legislature.

This year's budget is really tight, Hall said, because of the 1-percent budget cut and other factors that drained the budget. Reallocating funds does not appear to be a viable option at this point, he said. An increase in tuition was also another option that Hall did not support.

"We just have to let the state Legislature know this is a priority to students, as well as the university," Hall said. "We need funding from the state Legislature to afford better GTAs."

Hall said it was not going to be an easy task. It was going to be an uphill battle because of the state's shrinking budget. Graduate teaching assistants also have a negative image, which needs to change, Hall said.

"We need more recognition for outstanding teaching," Hall said. "There is a negative image of the whole profession. We need to publicize excellence."

The screening process for GTAs was also an inefficient evaluation process, Hall said. Under the current process, GTAs are not evaluated until six weeks into the semester. By that time, it is too late to replace them. There should be better evaluation at the beginning before they are admitted to teach a class, he said.

Drew Maenche and Ali Karimi, both juniors in electronic journalism, include GTAs on their platform for their student body presidential campaign. They said if students can't understand how to figure out their classes or what the teacher is saying, they aren't going to understand it by themselves.

Maenche and Karimi proposed a stronger review of GTAs and better training sessions. Many GTAs have a lot to offer, Maenche said. The university shouldn't discriminate against them just because they can't speak English well. K-State can offer classes to help them with their verbal skills, he said.

"We need to filter out teachers that lack proficiency," Karimi said. "We need to improve the verbal prowess of the teachers."

Candidates Jeremy Claeys, junior in electronic journalism, and Amy Metzinger, sophomore in agricultural economics, also argue the issue.

"The key is to pay them enough to recruit and keep quality GTAs," Claeys said. "We only get quality if we can afford it."

Claeys said students must decide right now that this is a priority. K-State must receive funding from Topeka at a fair rate in order to afford good GTAs. He also said the university must be smart in the hiring process. Because K-State is an institution of higher learning, he said, it should help the GTAs not fluent in English work on their verbal skills.

"We have the resources to educate incoming students that are not proficient in English," Hall said. "They deserve to be here. But don't let their lack of English proficiency hold them back."

Claeys said it is wrong to turn away quality GTAs. Minority GTAs who come here to become more fluent in English could be affected most by any changes.

If K-State had more funding, it wouldn't need to turn them away, he said.

"We've been doing more with less in the past," Claeys said. "We'd like to do more with more."

Fans should support women in final game

Go out and support the K-State women's basketball team at 7 tonight in Bramlage Coliseum.

More importantly, come out and say goodbye to the senior players.

For Angie Finkes, Nicky Ramage, Jenny Coalson and Olga Firsova, the Wildcats' game against Colorado will be the last time they play at Bramlage — a place that has been kind to the Cats, including an overall 33-17 record during the seniors' careers.

Amid one of the worst men's basketball seasons in school history, this is a great time to support the women. After all, the women do have a better record — 12-15 overall and 5-9 in the Big 12 Conference.

You have supported the women all season long, so finish strong and thank the seniors for four years of hard work.

In fact, K-State fans have filled the seats in record numbers this season. On Jan. 8 against the University of Kansas, 8,587 attended — the third-largest crowd in school history. Then, on Jan. 30 against Nebraska, 7,680 attended — the fourth-largest crowd.

This season's senior class has proved to be one of the best ever at K-State in the record books.

Ramage ranks fourth all-time in blocks, and Firsova leads in blocks with 98. In fact, Firsova's total ranks fifth in school history, including K-State's men. Firsova ranks behind only Manny Dies, Shawn Rhodes, Gerald Eaker and Les Craft in blocked shots.

Finkes also owns a few records. She is eighth in school history in rebounds and field-goal attempts. She is sixth in field goals made and 10th in career starts.

With the end of the women's basketball season near, show your school spirit and support the seniors in their final home game before they compete in the Big 12 Tournament.

I would just like to comment on the PDA on the back side of Monday's Collegian. It was absolutely disgusting.

I'm calling in reply to the guy who has a football table and race track in his house. I'm a girl and I need your digits.

I would just like to thank all the people who are putting all of the chalk on the sidewalks. Now I have chalk all over my Pumas.

Maybe we should get rid of the basketball program and get a K-State men's tennis team.

How about we give Asbury some chalk so he can campaign for his job next year.

I would like to applaud the Collegian for its diverse coverage during Black History Month. You guys went out of your way to not just offer the anglo-Christian views.

If Roney didn't have a Bible, would he have anything to write about?

Hey, Asbury. This is Country Kitchen. We don't want you.

Two cents.

I'd just like to give my props to Gutenberg for inventing the printing press, which makes the Collegian possible.

My Monday was going really, really bad until I got to the last page of the paper. Lovers at sunset. Ah, Kelly Glasscock, you rule.

Again, to all of you fools, I say again: Spinal Tap has already been to Manhattan. Give it up.

At the library, I saw two people in Blue Key sweatshirts making a girl run around in a bird suit. In the greek system, we call that hazing.

Hey, whoever thinks Spinal Tap is not a real band is wrong. I own a Spinal Tap album.

What's the deal with philosophy? It's got to be the biggest waste of time and money that any Arts and Sciences student has to take.

Oh, I love a man in uniform.

Forget about the smoke on campus. I'm more concerned about chalk dust in my lungs.

dying for your faith

Christians continue to be persecuted for their beliefs now more than ever

She was 17 years old. He stood staring at her, his weapon before her face. "Do you believe in God?" She paused. It was a life-or-death question. "Yes, I believe in God." "Why?" asked her executioner. But he never gave her the chance to respond. The teenage girl lay dead at his feet. —"Jesus Freaks" by DC Talk and the Voice of the Martyrs.

The girl's name was Rachel Scott, and it happened at Columbine High School in Littleton, Colo., on April 20, 1999.

Her story is a testament of what real faith is: a faith so strong you stand up for the truth of God no matter what the consequences.

Rachel is one of many who have given their lives on Earth and exchanged them for the heavenly rewards that await them with Jesus.

Here is a list of a few who lived before Rachel but met her same fate:

■ Stephen

According to "Foxe's Book of Martyrs," a well-respected literary work from the 16th century author John Foxe, Stephen preached the message of Christ to the men who betrayed and murdered Jesus. As a result, Stephen was cast out of the city, where he was stoned to death shortly after Jesus' death and resurrection.

■ James the Apostle

Ten years after Stephen's death, James was led out to be executed. Along the way, his accuser was so moved by James' courage and steadfastness that he repented and professed himself to be a Christian. The two of them were beheaded side by side.

■ Philip

The first to be called "disciple," he was scourged, thrown into prison and crucified.

■ Matthew

Tax collector and author of the Gospel of Matthew. He was slain with a halberd — an axe-like weapon — in A.D. 60.

■ James the Less

Author of the book of James, a New Testament epistle. At the age of 94, he was beaten and stoned by the Jews, and finally his head was crushed with a club.

■ Matthias

The apostle who took Judas' place as a disciple after Judas hung himself. He was stoned in Jerusalem and then beheaded.

■ Mark

Author of the Gospel of Mark, he was dragged to pieces by the people of Alexandria because of their idol Serapis.

■ Peter

The disciple who denied Christ three times but was reinstated by Jesus after his resurrection. It is said history holds that he was crucified upside-down because he said he was unworthy to be crucified in the same manner as Christ.

■ Paul

One of the key writers of the New Testament, Paul was known for his perseverance through a life of persecution, suffering and imprisonment. He eventually was beheaded.

■ John

Also known as the "beloved disciple," he was cast into a cauldron of boiling oil in Rome. By a miracle, John escaped without bodily harm. He was banished to the Isle of Patmos, where he wrote the Book of Revelation. He was the only apostle who did not die a violent death. Why is any of this important?

These were not lukewarm, contemporary-American Christians. They were true followers of Christ, no matter what it cost them.

They knew what it was to truly be saved — to love Christ so much you are willing to give up everything you have for him, even your life.

Today, we have it easy in the United States, but Christians worldwide are persecuted more than ever.

There are more Christian martyrs today than there were in the days of the disciples.

According to the World Christian Encyclopedia, there were about 156,000 Christians martyred in 1998.

In many countries that practice Islam as their main religion, it is considered blasphemy to convert to Christianity. Because of this, Bibles are scarce, and Christians must have secret meetings to study the Bibles they becoming more diverse.

Many times, lines are drawn between Greeks, independents and minorities on campus. This is a shame, because everyone has something to offer. K-State should not be a place where ignorance leads and knowledge follows.

Another issue our campaign addresses is parking. Some campaigns have proposed a parking garage should be put up.

We think a garage only would delay the trouble with parking until it turns bad once again. Our campaign proposes a mass-transit system be put into place now to delay larger costs in the future.

As students, we should unite and make this one of the strongest Big 12 Conference schools.

Please vote March 6-8 to make your voice heard.

ADAM HAYES/Collegian

do have.

It is to be expected that Christians will be persecuted.

The world does not want to accept the fact it is answerable to God someday for what it has done on Earth, and eternity depends on whether people followed Jesus.

The world hated Jesus. It couldn't accept him. People's finite minds could not comprehend the infinite God that became flesh and walked among them, so they killed him.

Jesus said in John 15:18-19, "If the world hates you, keep in mind that it hated me first. If you belonged to the world, it would love you as its own. As it is, you do not belong to the world, but I have chosen you out of the world. That is why the world hates you."

Christians can learn a lot from the lives of those who have died for serving Christ. If we as followers of Christ aren't mocked or made fun of because of what we believe, maybe we should take a look at the lives we are living.

If we can't stand for Jesus when times are relatively easy, how are we going to stand for him when things get really tough?

The apostle Paul summed it up in the Book of Romans when he said, "For to me, to live is Christ and to die is gain."

There is an eternal paradise that awaits those who are faithful to Christ to the end. It blows away any riches and far outweighs any trials and tribulations this world has to offer.

The apostle Paul knew it, and Rachel Scott knew it, too.

Maenche, Karimi focus on common issues; candidates pledge to pursue realistic goals

I'm running for president with the frame of mind that this campaign is here for change.

This message is unlike any of the other eight you will read. I am not going to sugar coat what I have to say with a long column about campus issues I cannot possibly put into effect when I am president. I can make promises all day, but the reality is, we can't change everything.

Let me first give a few reasons why we have decided to run for office this year.

The first reason has to be the fact that Ali and I have been going here for about three years and have seen marginal change in the way of life for K-State students. Like many of you, we found ourselves fed up with the way things were going and decided to get out and make some changes.

Year after year, presidents come and go without making a difference, and you, the student, lose faith and interest in student government. This campaign was founded in the interest of change and the idea that something will get done, not the idea of building a résumé.

One thing this campaign won't do is spend thousands of dollars on T-shirts, posters, huge signs, suits and other meaningless things.

You won't see those in our campaign because we are like every struggling college student who is trying to make it through without a huge debt. During the past few years, some candidates have spent huge amounts and basically bought the presidential seat.

This campaign is focused on not one but many issues facing students every day. One issue on which our campaign is focusing is the budget and tuition, which seem to go hand in hand. As tuition goes up every year, we keep seeing programs and classes cut.

As a student paying out-of-state tuition, I think something is wrong with this logic. The teachers work hard for little money and could get a pay raise to be more competitive among other universities.

Student Governing Association also has one of the largest budgets on record, but funds seem to be stopped and programs suffer. K-State needs to expand in many areas, along with

GUEST VIEWPOINT

MCCURRY HELLER

McCurry, Heller vow to lead by listening; duo's platform reflects students' concerns

Kylo and I seek answers to our campus's problems directly from you.

Are you looking for change? Are you looking for realistic solutions to basic problems? Are you looking for new faces and a new face for our student government?

Jesse McCurry and Kylo Heller are not afraid to buck conventional political wisdom.

General George S. Patton used to say, "Americans love a winner and will not tolerate a loser." Losers, in our opinion, are those too proud to ask for help and too afraid to give credence to the people who know more than them: the great students of our campus.

It is our belief that the best leaders are the best listeners and have the networking ability to find the right solutions. Kylo and I are such leaders.

This election is about who will bring good ideas and vision to the race. It also is an election where the winners should be the most balanced, the most levelheaded and the least concerned about getting credit where it is not deserved.

Kylo and I want to accomplish several specific goals in the next year and get the ball rolling on a few others. This is what you can expect from us if we get your votes.

■ We want to create a annual campus rally: Powercat Pride 2000. It will take place the first part of September in the quad, or on the lawn in front of Anderson. The rally will recognize the new student body, significant student/faculty accomplishments from the past year and will provide a preview of the football season.

Establishing new traditions at K-State is important to all of us as we look to new ways of bringing our students, alumni and our community together.

■ We want to create a call-in hotline — like the Campus Fourum — where you can call and complain, provide advice and bring attention to concerns regarding government issues: 532-PREZ. We will work with the Collegian to advertise the number and respond to questions and concerns on a regular basis.

■ We will work to expand the programming options available on K-State's ECC cable channel 8 and the bulletin board on channel 26. We would like to provide coverage of campus speakers, Landon Lectures, classic football games, campus life and even broadcast Student Senate live. We also would like to televise a regular call-in question-and-answer session between listeners and SGA.

■ We want to expand the hours during which Hale Library is available to students.

■ Kylo and I vehemently oppose building a Student Activity Center. We feel the need has not been established and students would rather see their privilege fees spent elsewhere.

Kylo and I have several concrete ideas, but our platform continues to be written by students like you.

Join our growing campaign and the growing anticipation of a campaign where we decide together what is best for our student body and K-State.

Communication important part of becoming president

By CRISTINA JANNEY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Issues might come and go, but the next student body president will continue to face the challenge of communicating with students.

Jesse McCurry, presidential candidate, and Kyo Heller, vice-presidential candidate, said low voter turnout rates show student government is not serving students like it should.

"Most students are turned off by student government," McCurry said. "They are not being invited in."

The candidates said they don't have all the answers but they have connections on campus to find answers to difficult problems.

"I am confident in my ability to network and find solutions," McCurry said. "I know people that know the answers."

In their campaign, they have solicited ideas from the students. They leave blank spots on copies of their platforms so ideas can be added.

Other candidates endorse the same issues that have been debated over and over, the candidates said.

"People say they support parking," McCurry said, "but that is like saying you support the sun coming up tomorrow."

The candidates support creating a fall rally on campus. The rally would recognize the student body president, student awards, faculty accomplishments, the football team, President Jon Wefald, Coach Bill Snyder and the Manhattan mayor.

"It would be a way we can invite new students to come in and give them a welcome mat," McCurry said.

Initial costs would be incidental, McCurry said. He said he hoped as the event grew, it could draw sponsors who would donate prizes for a raffle.

"It would give us a chance to find out what the new student body is like," he said.

The candidates also support a hotline that could be used to elicit student ideas and opinions.

Student Senate has a hotline that has been active for about a year.

Jake Worcester, Student Senate chair, said the hotline has received low to moderate use.

If students leave their name and a way to be contacted, students research their question and try to get back to them with an answer, he said.

Worcester said the hotline simply might need more promotion.

McCurry said some of those questions could be addressed in a regular feature in the Collegian.

Jeremy Claes also thought using the Collegian or a talk show on the radio station would be good ways to connect with students.

In addition, Claes said he would like to use the Internet to reach students.

"Computers are a huge part of student government operations and campus operations," he said. "To utilize computers is where we need to go."

Student government already has a Web site, but Claes said the site could be more interactive.

"We don't want them to just access information but to participate," Claes said.

Computers can be a great equalizer when it comes to sharing ideas with student government, he said.

"There are a lot of ideas out there that don't get realized because so few students are representing the campus."

Claes said it is time student government tapped into K-State's wealth of brilliant minds.

"If you offer students a place to go and voice their opinions and ideas, they will take advantage of it," he said.

Justin Gunter shared some ideas with the other candidates. He supported a regular feature in the Collegian on what is going on in student government.

He supported a talk show on the campus radio station and on the Internet. He said he thought a table in the Union would spark student's interest in student government.

McCurry and Heller want Student Senate to hit the airwaves. They want to explore the possibility of Senate broadcast live over the local cable channel. McCurry said he would even explore the possibility of students being able to call in.

In addition to Senate on television, McCurry said he would like to see events such as Landon Lectures, other speakers, and a monthly president's question session with live call-in questions broadcast on the local cable channel.

McCurry said the ideas won't be recognized soon, but he is working toward finding solutions.

"We can't solve the problems tomorrow, but we can work toward creative ways to do that," he said.

STEVEN DEARINGER/COLLEGIAN

Jesse McCurry, senior in agricultural journalism, and Kyo Heller, junior in agronomy, are running for student body president and vice president. Polls are open March 6-8 on KATS.

McCurry, Heller place focus on communication, oppose idea of building Student Activity Center

By CRISTINA JANNEY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jesse McCurry and Kyo Heller said they are looking to support practical projects that students want.

A new Student Activities Center is not on that list.

"I don't think the people support it," McCurry, student-body presidential candidate, said. "I don't think a need has been established."

McCurry, senior in agriculture communication and journalism, said he also did not see groups clamoring for more meeting space.

The candidates said if students express a desire for that project and it is needed, the issue could be revisited sometime later.

"We don't see a direct benefit for KSU," said Heller, vice presidential candidate and junior in agronomy. "There are a lot of ways to spend money that would benefit students."

Another project the candidates did not favor is a parking garage.

"We don't think it is necessary or practical, and it is going to cost $10 million," McCurry said.

He said something needs to be done soon to deal with the parking problem because of the increase in student enrollment expected this fall.

McCurry said he favored a busing program, but the wait for shuttles would need to be around five minutes.

The busing system could be tested to see if it would meet students' needs and students would use it, McCurry said.

"We should try the busing system first," Heller said. "If we build a parking garage, and it doesn't work, we will have a $10 million parking garage sitting there."

The candidates said they hoped a possible city transportation system could be integrated with the K-State project.

"We could cut costs on both sides," Heller said. Lengthening library hours was a plan Heller and McCurry said they thought was feasible and beneficial to students.

"Some students have complained that the Rec has longer hours than the library," McCurry said. "Symbolically, we have a problem with that."

He said students see the 24-hour study area as cramped.

Another project on the candidates' list is high-quality advising like the students in the College of Agriculture enjoy, they said.

The candidates said they would like to see some accountability for advisers and rewards for advisers who perform well.

"We would like good advisers to grow in their advising," he said.

The candidates did not have any ideas of how advisers would be able to balance increasing number of advisees with other responsibilities of research and teaching.

McCurry and Heller come from farming backgrounds. McCurry is from a farm and ranch near Wichita. Heller came from a farm and ranch near Hunter, Kan., 200 miles west of Manhattan.

McCurry ran and won a seat on Student Senate his freshman year.

McCurry said he started at K-State as a political science major but decided to go back to his roots and joined the College of Agriculture.

However, McCurry has retained his interest in politics. He served as an intern last summer for a lobby firm in Washington, D.C.

McCurry said he planned to go to graduate school in speech communication.

Both candidates have had leadership positions in Alpha Gamma Rho.

Heller was president of the fraternity, and McCurry was the recruitment director. The fraternity subsequently won a national award for recruitment.

"I think AGR gave me all the leadership skills I have used in school," McCurry said.

Dry weather causes 'electrifying' charges

By NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

During this time of year, having a "shocking" appeal might not refer to appearance.

Kirsten Hogg, research associate in physics, said winter's dry weather is the perfect condition for static electricity to occur, causing some people to become "electrifying."

"It's because the humidity is so low," Hogg said.

Because the weather is so dry, she said, there is not enough water vapor in the air to conduct away the electrical charge.

"Water stops the electrical charge, but since it's so dry, that's not happening," Hogg said.

Dean Zollman, professor of physics, said the charge is formed by causing friction between two objects.

"Rubbing any two things together rubs electrons off of one object on to another, so one object ends up with a positive charge, and one ends up with a negative charge," Zollman said.

The object with the positive charge lacks electrons, while the one with the negative charge has too many. When the electrons transfer back to their original place, the "shock" occurs.

"The makeup of material decides which object hangs on to more electrons," Zollman said.

He said the only way the electrons will transfer, though, is if there is a third object present to which they might transfer.

Hogg said many things are factors in how much charge each object will build up.

"There's a lot of different factors that affect how much static electricity builds up," she said.

She said not only does the dry weather affect static electricity, but so does clothing.

"It depends on what clothes you're wearing and what they are made of," Hogg said.

"If you're wearing clothes like wool, they get especially staticy during this time of year."

She said materials such as polyester also tend to build up a larger electrical charge.

"Pick your clothes carefully," Zollman said. When entering a car, Hogg said she recommends touching the door or handle with an arm. Increasing the surface area decreases the intensity of the shock, she said.

"If you close the door with an arm, it creates a larger surface area for shock, rather than touching it with your hand or finger," she said.

Hogg said people can decrease their risk of being shocked by grounding themselves.

"Ground yourself," Hogg said. "By grounding yourself, the charge is leaving your body and going into something else."

She said even though the voltage created by static electricity is extremely high, it is not dangerous due to its low current.

"It's just something that happens in the winter," she said. "Hold hands before you kiss if you're really worried."

"Water stops the electrical charge, but since it's so dry, that's not happening."

1 arrest made in Aggieville forgery case

■ Area bars reported use of stolen checks; 11 offenses counted.

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

At least one arrest was made Monday night in connection with a string of Aggieville forgeries, an officer with the Riley County Police Department said.

Eleven offenses were reported in the area, Sgt. Bob Saber said, as forged checks were reported that evening in bars such as Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon, Scoreboard and O'Malley's Alley.

"We got turned onto it last night from a guy, and it just sort of snowballed," Saber said.

After the officer in Aggieville was tipped off, Saber said one suspect was arrested about 11:30 p.m.

D.J. Bruce, manager of Scoreboard, said he wasn't in at the time his business received a forged check, but his copy of the check said it was for $25.

Kyle Swenson, bartender at O'Malley's, said he wasn't around for the transaction, but said a copy of his bar's check was for $30 and the original had already been confiscated by police.

J.B. Kemper, bartender at 12th Street Pub, said the man had come in about 9:30 p.m. to pay the cover fee and buy a pitcher of beer with a check for $25, which meant about $20 in change came back to him.

Kemper said he thought at first the large check was strange but said people did it from time to time. The man wrote the check in neat cursive writing and had no checkbook cover.

"That was another thing I thought was funny," Kemper said.

After talking for about 20 to 30 minutes the man, whom Kemper guessed to be about 28-years-old, left.

About 10:30 p.m. an officer came in to ask about checks under a certain name. Kemper said he told the officer about the check he already accepted and sent a bartender to make a copy so the officer could confiscate the original. Kemper said that because they all had gotten a good look at the man, he sent one of the doormen out with the officer to search for the suspect afterwards.

"We were keeping a close eye on Aggieville for him last night," he said.

As far as Kemper had known, though, the search was unsuccessful.

Saber indicated some of the forged checks might have been third-party checks, where one person's check is written to a second, who endorses it, and a third person tries to cash it.

"Third parties are rare because most businesses won't cash them," he said. "The best way to avoid being the victim of forgery is to ask for ID."

Saber said he did not know if the suspect had shown any identification with the checks.

body president. Finally, there is one faculty member chosen by the mayor from a list of three.

Joey Bahr, senior in political science, is one of the two members of the committee who represent the student body.

"A good chunk of the money comes from students since the program is funded by sales taxes on campus," Bahr said. "So, it's only natural that students should have some input about the projects on campus."

Some of the committee's other projects include the transformation of North Manhattan Avenue from a four-lane to a three-lane street with a bicycle lane, the gardens north of Throckmorton Hall and the Anderson Avenue expansion.

John Struve, K-State budget director, helps gather information for the group's recommended projects and outlines the committee's budget.

This year, the budget amounted to $335,000, Struve said. The projects under consideration are for 2001, he said. All seven of the proposed projects were approved in a Feb. 15 City Commission meeting.

The committee is planning to put together a map shows the city/university projects that have made a difference.

"The committee does not have a lot of money compared to the $400 million that the university has to work with," Struve said. "But still, many improvements would not have been made if it was not for the committee."

Requests for 2001 project fund

The City Commission passed all seven requested projects for the 2001 budget. The requests are admitted officially into the budget in August. Since 1996, when the program began constructing proposed projects, the committee has allocated more than $1.5 million to projects mutually beneficial to the university and Manhattan.

Telefund.

"I didn't do it last year, but this year, I was out there helping raise it," Dover said.

Dover said she enjoyed the opportunity to meet and talk with people in her major.

"It was fun," she said. "One thing I really got out of it was talking to alumni from my major. I got to learn about things that I probably wouldn't have otherwise."

Dowell said most collegiate telephone campaigns run year-round and involve paid callers. He said K-State's KSU Foundation Telefund is the world's largest all-volunteer telephone campaign for higher education.

"We've been able to do some real strategic things," Dowell said. The fact that K-State ranks seventh nationally and third in the Big 12 for the percentage of alumni supporting their alma mater reflects their dedication, he said.

"Not only are our alumni very supportive, but they are very good about following through with their commitments," Dowell said. "It's remarkable."

Scholarships and prizes that Telefund participants are eligible to receive are being chosen and verified, Dowell said. They will be awarded, along with the grand prize of a 1999 Dodge Neon, on March 31 at the Nestle Telefund Prize Bash.

"I was amazed by the results," said Jamie Burkholder, freshman in business, a first-time participant. "I had no idea you could raise that much money in that little of time."

"Being part of that team and raising more money than in the past is a great feeling."

and West stadiums that would include locker rooms and restrooms.

"With the funds we have now, we will put in the natural grass system this year," Taussig said. "We are also considering adding lighting to the stadium as well as other features inside the stadium for the club sports to use."

Carter said another thing that must be taken into account is that the existing football field at Memorial Stadium is used by the K-State Marching Band during the fall for practice. He said everybody who either uses the track or field must be relocated until the construction is completed.

"Just as the folks who run on the track will have to be moved, so will the band and the other intramural teams," Carter said. "We have been looking into a variety of other locations to accommodate the groups, and for a period of time, they will have to practice at other locations either on campus or in the city."

Carter said renovations to the interiors of East and West stadiums have been in the works for several years. He said work has been done to improve fire protection standards for the Department of Fine Arts.

He said, however, that after the construction is completed on Fiedler Hall and the Ackert Hall addition, which is set to be completed in the next 18 months, many departments will be moved into new accommodations. When the Ackert addition is completed, biology, biochemistry and cancer research will all be moved into the new building, which will allow for additional space in Willard Hall for the art department.

"We started moving the art department into Willard some years ago," Carter said. "The additional space will allow us to move a large portion of the remainder of the department, but until that time, we have to continue to make minor renovations to East and West stadium for the safety of both the students and the faculty."

Playing WOMAN'S GAME

PHOTOS AND STORY BY JUSTIN HAYWORTH

Renaire Palmer looks on with disgust after making an error while running an offensive play during practice. In the background, head women's basketball coach Deb Patterson expresses her displeasure.

Jason Ramos (left), Renaire Palmer (middle) and Galen Harkness enjoy a breather while the women do shooting drills during an afternoon practice.

All-male practice squad helps prepare women for competition

Kyle Carothers is not a star, and you've probably never heard his name called out over the P.A. system at Bramlage Coliseum, but he takes the court daily as a member of the practice squad that scrimmages against the women's basketball team.

Carothers, sophomore in business, is doing something he said he loves to do.

"Being a guy you try to take it a little easier on the girls," Carothers said. "But they play pretty rough, and you can't give up too much or you'll get schooled."

When K-State head coach Deb Patterson arrived from Vanderbilt in 1996, she brought more than coaching style and experience with her. She also instituted the use of male players in practice.

Using men to practice against the women's team is commonplace in the Southeastern Conference, which boasts three of the top 10 teams in women's basketball this year, K-State assistant coach Sue Serafini said. She also said after four years, the players are a valuable part of the team.

"They are the second team. Without them there is no way we could be getting better every single day, because they make us get better every single day," Serafini said.

One of Serafini's first jobs when she arrived at K-State with Patterson was to set up the practice team comprised of male players.

"The guys that work for us or play with us don't get anything from this," Serafini said. "This is purely volunteer. We don't supply them with anything."

"They want to do this for the love of the game, to be a contributing member of our program and to be a part of K-State basketball in some small way."

At practice, the men are expected to perform at the same level as the women. If they make an error, they get yelled at just like the women. When the men slack off and don't work their hardest, the women can't get better, Serafini said.

Aaron Rodehorst, sophomore in business, is in his first year on the team. He played all four years in high school and said he enjoys the competitive spirit of practice.

"You feel like you are a big part," Rodehorst said. "You're preparing them for every game, and when they lose a game you feel like you didn't do the preparations for it."

The two teams get along like brothers and sisters who compete against one another but who also can be there to build each other up, Serafini said.

"They hurt with us when we lose," Serafini said.

Tim Ketterman, junior in business, has been on the team for two years and takes personal pride in every game the women win. He said he would like to take a little credit for it, although he believes the women do all the work.

"Every time they lose, you think, 'Well, maybe if we would have played a little harder,'" Ketterman said, "they could've adjusted differently."

A smaller and quicker Tim Ketterman goes in for a layup around 6-foot-8-inch Olga Firsova during a defensive drill for the women.

K-State takes on Baylor in Waco

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Baylor and K-State look quite similar on paper.

Both like recruiting from the community-college ranks, and both sport less-than-stellar Big 12 Conference records.

Tonight's game, at 7 in Waco, Texas, between the Bears the Wildcats also will be a battle of clubs hovering near the Big 12 cellar: K-State has a 2-12 league record, while Baylor is 3-11.

K-State (9-16), which finally ended its 11-game losing streak last week against Texas A&M, dropped yet another Saturday to fellow cellar-dweller Texas Tech.

Baylor (12-13) hasn't had much success this season, but the little it has had can be attributed to the solid community-college transfers it picked up in the off-season.

Leading the way on offense is junior guard DeMarcus Minor from Barton County Community College, who is averaging 11.4 points a game and nearly six assists.

K-State assistant coach Mark Fox said that compared with Oklahoma State point guard Doug Gottlieb, Minor can do so much more.

"Minor is good in a lot of areas on the court," Fox said. "He's not just good in one department of the game. He's good at everything he does."

"With a guy like that, you aren't going to stop him. You just hope you can contain him."

Another community-college product who has produced for the Bears is Terry

Black, a 6-foot-7-inch junior forward who averages 12 points and eight rebounds.

Baylor's leading scorer is 5-11 senior guard Tevis Stukes, who averages 17.4 points.

Though not mentioned in the same sentence as other conference standouts such as Texas' Chris Mihm and Iowa State's Marcus Fizer, Fox said Stukes is a very fine player who can hurt a team if he isn't closely guarded.

"He's on a team that's on the bottom half of the league," Fox said. "But he's a real good guard, and we need to challenge him, keep hands in his face and hope he doesn't hurt us like he has other teams."

The Cats received some great scoring from community college transfer Kelvin Howell, who had 20 points against Texas Tech on Saturday.

"Kelvin has played well over the last two weeks," Fox said. "He did a nice job finishing strong around the basket."

Fox said K-State and Baylor's liking for community-college players is similar, but with those kind of players everything is a learning experience.

"There are a lot of juco colleges out there, and a lot of talented players there, too," Fox said. "One thing you have to remember is that it takes a lot of time to adjust to this level and the systems."

Other transfers on the K-State roster include seniors Tony Kitt and Cortez Groves, and junior guard Galen Morrison, who has been dismissed from the team.

Groves and Kitt lead K-State in scoring with 17.4- and 13.1-point averages, respectively.

Golfer ties low record

By DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Freshman Elise Carpentier shot a 75 Monday to lead the field at the Edwin Watts/Carolinas Collegiate Classic in Pinehurst, N.C.

Carpentier's first round total ties the lowest round of her career.

After day one of the tournament, the Wildcats sit in eighth place in the 26-team field, shooting a team-total of 324.

"The course plays tough here at Pinehurst and the greens are playing fast," K-State head coach Kristi Knight said. "It was windy, and it came from a different direction and was stronger. It made the par-4's a little longer."

Winthrop leads the tournament, while Kansas, the only other Big 12 school in the competition, sits in fourth.

The Cats returned to the course for the final 18 holes Tuesday, but results were unavailable at press time.

Senior women's farewell tonight against Colorado

By MICHAEL NOLL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It has not sunk in for them yet, but the K-State women's basketball team's game against Colorado tonight will be four seniors' final regular season appearance in Bramlage Coliseum.

As much time as these four seniors, Jenny Coalson, Angie Finkes, Olga Firsova and Nicky Ramage, have spent on basketball, the finality of bidding farewell to the past four years is strange, senior forward Nicky Ramage said.

"It's kind of scary because it doesn't really set in right now," Ramage said. "We've played so many games that it just feels like we're going to play another game, get a win and go on to the next game. It's going to be different, though, when your parents are out there on the floor actually with you before the game. It's exciting, it really is."

The contributions that these four seniors have made to women's basketball at K-State have given fans plenty to be excited about. They were the present coaching staff's first recruiting class and have been the driving force behind the program's improvement, K-State assistant coach Sue Serafini said.

"They've been a cornerstone of this program," Serafini said. "They've helped us achieve everything that we have achieved thus far, and they have helped really lay down the foundation and the groundwork for where women's basketball here at Kansas State is going to go."

In the last four years, K-State has gone 38-17 at home and appeared in both the NCAA and WNIT tournaments. Members of the senior class also have clawed their way into the K-State leading career charts in areas such as blocked shots, assists, career starts, rebounds and points scored.

To celebrate these achievements, fans are encouraged to attend the game and show their support for the seniors and the program in general, Serafini said.

"It's awesome to be surrounded by the people that helped make that experience so special," Serafini said. "If people can come out and say thanks to our seniors and say, 'We support what you have done the last four years for women's basketball,' it would mean the world to the staff and, more specifically, our seniors."

Fans who attend the contest also will get to see two teams who play each other closely. In the Cats' previous game against the Buffaloes in Boulder, K-State pulled out a 62-54 victory. Firsova blocked four shots, and the perimeter trio of juniors April Sailors and Kim Woodlee and sophomore Kristin Rethman drained ten three-pointers.

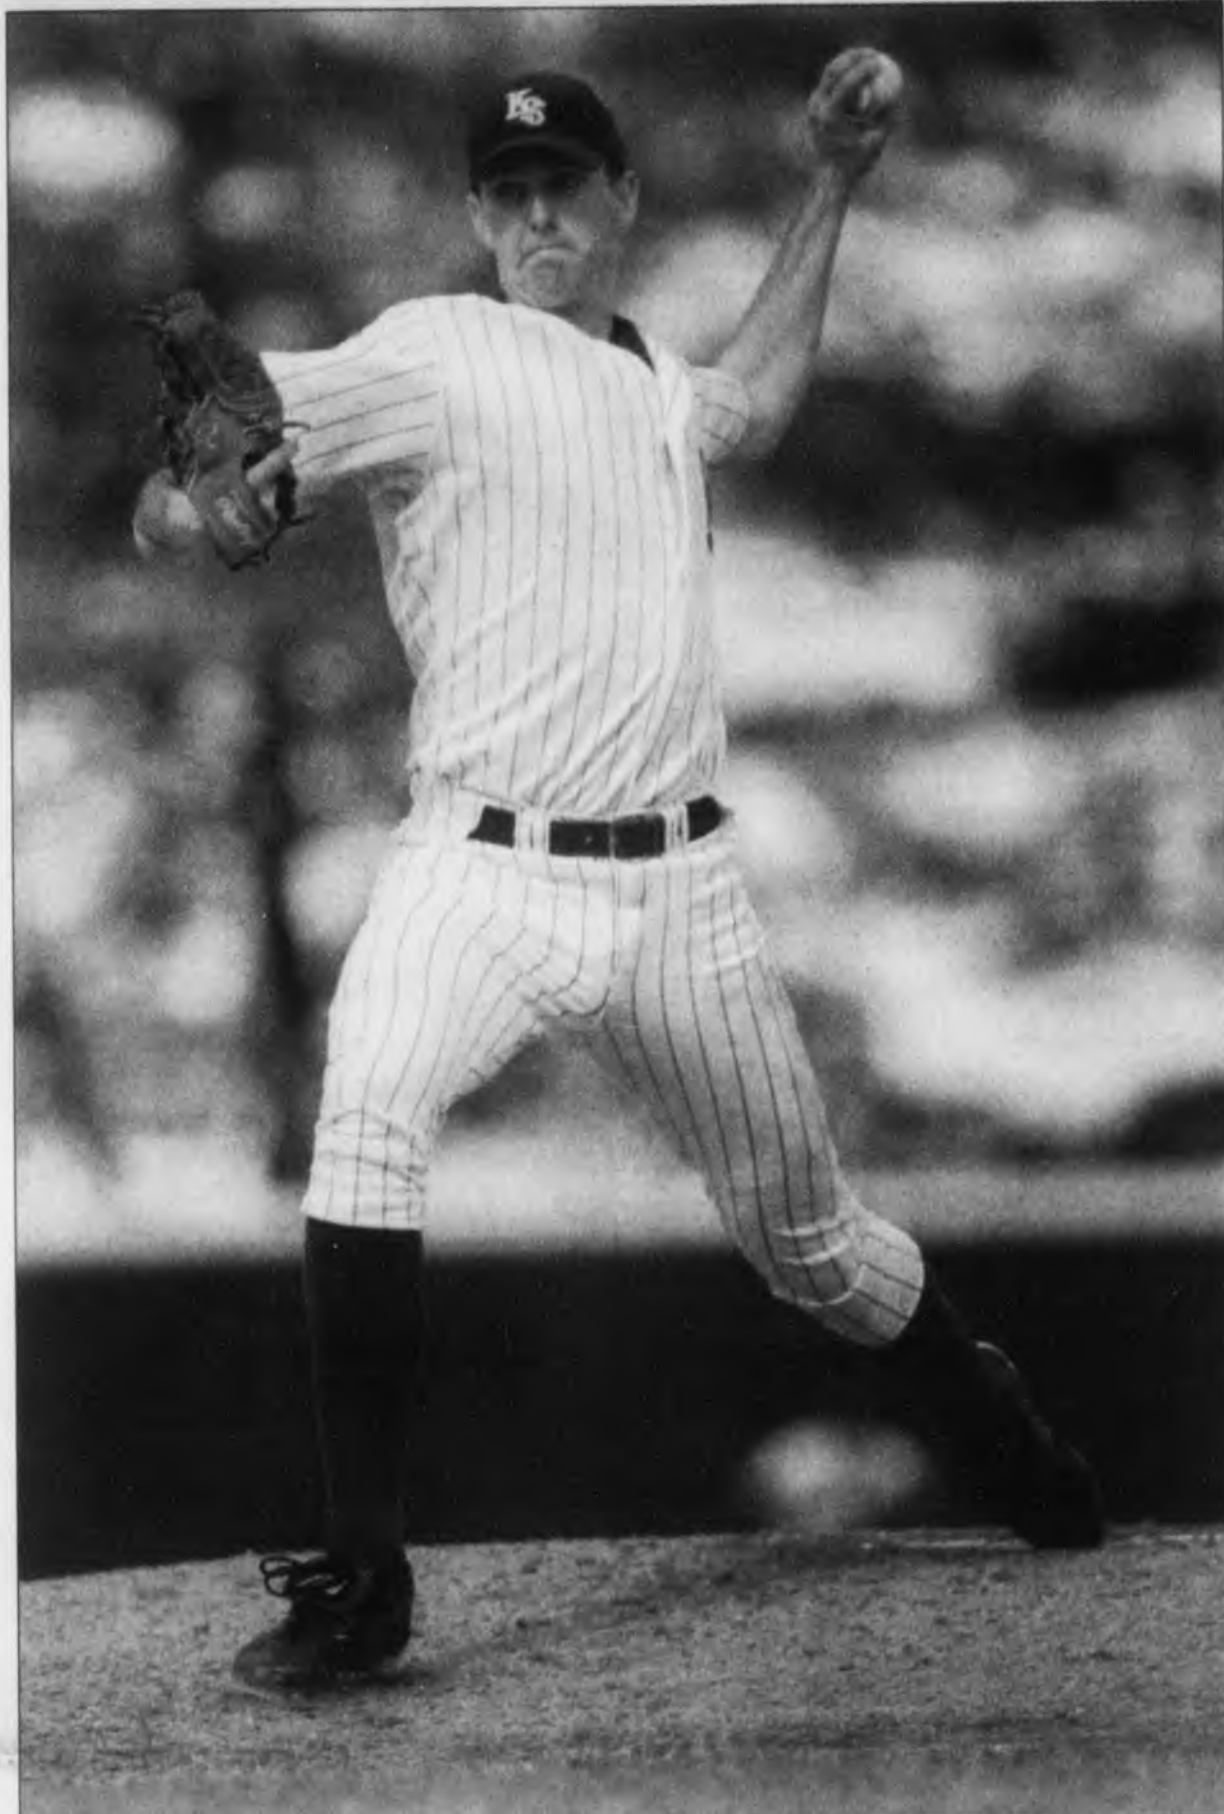

Colorado also features talented freshman forward Sabrina Scott, who was last week's Big 12 Rookie of the Week, following her 24-point, 13-rebound performance against Texas. The Buffaloes' most explosive player, however, is sophomore guard Jenny Roulier, K-State head coach Deb Patterson said.

"She's one of my favorite guards in this conference," Patterson said. "Jenny Roulier has found her stroke. She's shooting the ball from the three-point line very well. She's a great jump shooter."

Despite Roulier's recent successes, though, Colorado's strength still lies in its post game. As a result, the K-State seniors will have to keep proving themselves, even on their final regular-season home game, Patterson said.

"I like the fact that our seniors will go out with a great front line challenge," Patterson said.

Baseball team overcomes gusts, Southern Nazarene to end streak

It was as if the big bad wolf was standing over Frank Myers Field on Tuesday afternoon during K-State's 7-3 victory against Southern Nazarene.

Wind gusts nearing 40 mph regularly blew the numbers off of the manually operated scoreboard in right field, also wrecking havoc on fly balls in the outfield.

Mother Nature, however, could not make the Wildcats (3-7) extend their losing streak to eight games. Had K-State lost, it would have been the first time the Cats had dropped their first two home games since 1964.

K-State pitcher Kurt Lehmann tags out a Southern Nazarene base runner as he slides into home Tuesday afternoon at Frank Myers Field. Lehmann earned his first win as a Wildcat in his first start, with a score of 7-3.

To put it mildly, it was not easy to play with the wind swirling about.

"It's good for us to play in this kind of weather in the spring-time," head coach Mike Clark said. "It actually blew three different ways during the course of the ball game. We had to adjust to it blowing out, blowing to right and blowing straight in from left field. It keeps you on your toes."

K-State got started early from the plate. Senior second baseman Chad Tabor led off the game with a single, stole second base and then scored four batters later when junior Mark English cracked a single to notch his ninth RBI of the year.

Junior third baseman Josh Cavender hit the first home run of his career and just the third by K-State this year to lead off the second inning and push the Cats' lead to 2-0.

The Cats scored three runs in the fourth inning, extending their lead to 5-0. Cavender and sophomore catcher Tim Doty recorded back-to-back walks with one out. Junior outfielder Chris Nelson then reached base on an error to score Cavender. Tabor notched his second hit of the day to score Doty before junior catcher Graham McAllister reached base on another error that scored Nelson.

K-State added two runs in the seventh inning to put the game away. Junior outfielders Kasey Weishaar and Ben Olen had a pair of singles, with Weishaar scoring on a passed ball by Crimson Storm catcher Joey Burnett and Olen crossing the plate when senior designated hitter Travis Andre reached base on an error.

K-State roughed up Southern Nazarene starter Rafael Rigueiro for five hits and five runs in seven innings. Clark said Rigueiro signed to pitch at Cal State, Fullerton and Oklahoma before having academic and disciplinary problems.

"That was no ordinary pitcher they had out there and you could see that with his slider and the stuff he had," Clark said. "That was a Division-I arm, which is even better for us to see this time of year. Those who were successful should have a great deal of confidence because that was a big-time arm."

Sophomore Kurt Lehmann earned his first win as a Wildcat in his first start. The Washington transfer threw five innings, giving up one run on two hits, while striking out five and walking five.

K-State next travels to Oklahoma for a three-game series with the Sooners starting Friday.

Local Flatlander Jeep Club sees growth in members since 1993

By JEFF CALDWELL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Since 1993, Jim Arp has been part of a organization that thrives on one thing — Jeeps.

Arp, 53, of Manhattan, has been president of the Flatlanders Jeep Club since its conception almost seven years ago. It was a program originally introduced to him by a police officer from Topeka.

Since then, the club, which started out with fewer than 10 members in Manhattan, has grown to more than 100 members in eight states.

"We're probably the largest Jeep club in the nation," Arp said.

While Arp is the official president, he said his wife, Faye Arp, also is integral to the success of the club.

"She really does all the work, and I guess I take the credit for it," he said.

Even though the Flatlanders Jeep Club has experienced tremendous growth, Arp still recognizes the club's roots in Manhattan.

"We started out as the Flatlanders Jeep Club of Manhattan, and we still have the outline of the state of Kansas and a little apple on our jackets," he said.

The regular functions of the club consist mainly of meetings. Club members meet on the second Sunday of each month to discuss items of business.

"We try to keep the business part to a minimum," Arp said.

After the meetings, the group travels to just outside of the small town of Randolph, where they do what they love.

"As soon as we get all the business taken care of, we head up there and go jeepin' regardless of the weather," Arp said.

The land upon which the Flatlanders drive is owned by the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, but the club members are responsible for upkeep and maintenance. In addition to its regular meetings, the club also has fund-raising events throughout the year.

"We're a pretty self-sufficient organization," Arp said.

Along with the fun and excitement of the club, Arp said there are obligations and standards to which each member must adhere.

"We only have three rules: no alcohol, no firearms and you must own a Jeep," Arp said.

They also strive to build camaraderie by sharing ideas, experience and products with one another. In addition, they lend peace of mind to one another while driving. When one breaks down, others come to his or her aid.

For Jeep enthusiasts who might be hesitant about joining, Arp said there are three degrees of difficulty in the trails upon which they drive, ranging from those on which regular Jeeps can drive to those that require heavy-duty suspension, tires and engine performance.

The Flatlanders Jeep Club always is looking for new members. Many of the members are former K-State students or former military personnel, but as for current students, the numbers are not as great.

"Out of 100, I'd say there are probably 10 students," Arp said.

Arp said he wished he would have gotten involved with these activities sooner.

"I'm 53 years old, and I wish I'd gotten into it 20 years ago," he said.

Auburn player's violation comes amid plethora of NCAA scandals this season

If college basketball fans were hoping for a season full of controversy and lengthy suspensions, their wish was the NCAA's command.

The latest altercation involves Auburn forward Chris Porter. After Porter, a preseason All-America selection, admitted to taking $2,500 from a sports agent, Auburn officially declared him ineligible Monday.

I'd hate to see one of the league's most dynamic players, someone I'd pick to be one of the top three choices in this year's NBA Draft, sidelined for the NCAA Tournament. I'm a fan — what can I say?

The sad reality is, even if Porter can repay the $2,500, his reinstatement by the NCAA seems unlikely.

But there's always hope. Porter was suspended Sunday before the Tigers (No. 13 ESPN/USA Today, No. 19 Associated Press) faced Florida on Sunday. After learning of the infraction, school officials immediately sent Porter back to Auburn to talk to university and Southeastern Conference officials.

SEC commissioner Roy Kramer is helping the school complete its investigation so the report can be presented to the NCAA.

Two sources familiar to the case, speaking to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity, said Monday that Porter needed money to prevent his mother from being evicted from her rural south Alabama home.

However, the NCAA didn't seem to sympathize with Porter's reasons for accepting the money from an agent and likely will rule him ineligible for the rest of his college career.

Porter passed up the NBA Draft last year, partly because he wanted to help Auburn reach the Final Four. Now, he might have thrown it all away because of one poor decision.

You can't help but feel somewhat sorry for the guy, but he brought it all on himself. College basketball fans can't expect the NCAA to disregard the rules simply because Porter is one of the top players in the nation.

Sure, we all want to see him play, but it looks like he's going to have to bite the bullet on this one, so to speak.

After leading the Tigers to a 29-4 record a year ago, their first SEC regular-season title since 1990 and their first NCAA Tournament berth in 11 seasons, Porter had averaged 14.6 points and 7.3 rebounds before his suspension.

Despite the foolishness of his decision to take money from an agent, at least Porter is doing the right thing by admitting his mistake.

AP sources indicate that Auburn head coach Cliff Ellis hopes Porter's confession will lead the NCAA to reinstate Porter quickly.

Based on several precedents, student-athletes who take money from an agent usually receive a harsh suspension. Former UNLV center Keon Clark received a 14-game suspension two years ago for a similar infraction.

However, Porter's admission proves he is doing the smart thing in handling the situation. Just look at UCLA sophomore JaRon Rush.

Rush was slapped with a 29-game suspension Feb. 1, the equivalent of one full season, for benefits he allegedly received from a non-scholastic (AAU) coach when he was a prospective student-athlete in Kansas City, Mo.

However, Rush's suspension was reduced to nine games for UCLA's cooperation in the case, as the Bruins had suspended Rush indefinitely on Dec. 10 while they investigated possible NCAA violations.

The NCAA subcommittee on student-athlete reinstatement, responding to UCLA's appeal of the suspension, informed the university of its decision Monday.

Thursday's game against California will be Rush's ninth game of the current suspension, making him eligible to play Saturday against top-ranked Stanford.

It just goes to show that the current NCAA system is indeed fair in dealing with such player violations, which presents some hope for Porter.

Rush also was suspended for 15 games earlier this season for receiving $200 from a sports agent during the 1998-99 academic year. He already had missed 15 games by Feb. 1, satisfying that penalty.

So, if Auburn cooperates with the NCAA, Porter indeed might have a slim chance to return to the Tigers' lineup, as opposed to ending his stellar career on the bench.

However, others, such as Michigan freshman point guard Jamal Crawford, weren't as fortunate as Rush. Crawford, after finishing a six-game NCAA suspension last week, was suspended for eight more games last Thursday for newly discovered violations.

Consequently, with all the NCAA suspensions this season (and the likelihood of more to come), who knows what the tournament brackets will look like once March Madness rolls around?

Erick Jensen, graduate student in family life education and consultation, accepts the 2000 Outstanding Graduate Teaching Assistant of the Year Award on Tuesday evening in the K-State Student Union Main Ballroom.

By JUSTIN SCHUSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Erick Jensen said his high school biology teacher influenced him to pursue a career in education. "I didn't really consider anything else," Jensen said.

The Golden Key Executive Council has selected Jensen as the 2000 Outstanding Graduate Teaching Assistant of the Year.

Jensen will get his doctorate in family life education and consultation from K-State in May.

He has been teaching since 1979.

After obtaining an undergraduate degree from Chadron State University, Jensen began his career in education. He earned his masters degree in biology at Emporia State University while teaching at Junction City High School.

Jensen said he has been a GTA for the past three years. He teaches classes in sexuality and health, as well as a class on HIV/AIDS issues.

Jensen, his wife, Nancy, and their two daughters, Erin, 16, and Lyndee, 18, reside in Junction City.

He said he didn't make the decision to pursue his doctoral degree without the help of his family.

"We're a conferencing-type family," Jensen said. "I didn't decide to do this until I got the blessing from the other three members of my family."

Jensen said the most challenging part of teaching his curriculum is staying up-to-date with the topic.

"So much is happening so fast that what you set up this year won't be relevant next year," he said.

Jensen said this recognition was special because he was picked by a committee of students.

"It's student-driven. Faculty doesn't decide it," he said. "That within itself is a real big honor."

Betsy Bergen, professor of family studies and human services, nominated Jensen for the award.

She said Jensen's students think he is structured, disciplined and knowledgeable.

"I think the main thing is he cares," Bergen said.

Jensen accepted the award Tuesday evening at a banquet in his honor at the Union Main Ballroom.

Golden Key has honored the hard work and dedication of GTAs banquets for 13 years.

The selection for the award begins with nominations from deans and department heads. Applications then are sent to the nominees.

Robyn Powell, academic recognition chairwoman for Golden Key, said it's important to recognize outstanding GTAs.

"I feel that when a GTA is good enough to impact the lives of his students that he should be rewarded for that," Powell said.

"So much is happening so fast that what you set up this year won't be relevant next year."

Iranian officer's trial draws global attention

By AFSHIN VALINEJAD
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TEHRAN, Iran — An ex-police chief accused of ordering a brutal crackdown on university students went on trial Tuesday in a landmark civil rights case in Iran, where reformists are urging respect for laws often flouted by hard-line vigilantes.

One student testified he was beaten by police and vigilantes and thrown out a third-floor dormitory window. Another showed the judge his hollow eye socket, saying he had been hit by a tear-gas canister.

"It was a nightmare," said a third student, Ali Noruzi, who suffered a broken leg. "The word 'cruelty' doesn't describe what they did. They beat us with sticks, iron pipes, chains."

Brig. Gen. Farhad Nazari, the main defendant, sat impassively, but some of the 19 other accused smiled as nine students testified against them, describing the July 1999 events in horrific detail.

The trial signals the willingness of Iranian authorities to punish hard-liners who take the law into their own hands, usually with the help of vigilantes.

This is the first case to try the officers who ordered or took part in the July 9 raid on a Tehran University hostel to end a peaceful demonstration by students protesting the closure of a reformist newspaper.

The crackdown provoked six days of massive demonstrations in several major cities in Iran — the worst unrest since the 1979 Islamic revolution that installed the clergy's rule. Four days after the first raid, police again used force to end the protests.

Three people were killed in the unrest — a student, a cleric and a soldier — and more than 200 were wounded.

One month later, Nazari, 36, was dismissed as Tehran police chief. He was charged with ordering illegal entry, ignoring the orders of his superiors and sullying the police image. The others — 11 officers and eight unranked policemen — were charged with being accomplices and destroying public property. They face jail sentences of unspecified lengths.

Raamin Karimi, who walked to the stand with the aid of a crutch, testified that vigilantes and uniformed policemen dragged him from his third-floor room in the early hours of July 9.

Symposium offers insight to real business experiences

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Blake Chaffin looked out on the crowd before him Tuesday and saw his past and future.

As one of the panelists for the K-State Students In Free Enterprise's symposium on entrepreneurs, most of Chaffin's audience was composed of high school students who wanted to learn from his business experiences. But one of his listeners in the rows could say he helped Chaffin get his start.

Dave Wasinger, gifted coordinator at Hays High School and owner of his own photography business, has been taking students to trips like this symposium for years. In fact, he took Chaffin to one at Wichita State University when he was a high school student in Hays.

Chaffin, junior in marketing and international business, said he was not with the gifted program, but Wasinger let him tag along because there was room in the van.

"It was a total accident that I made it," he said.

At the symposium, he heard from a professional clown, a swim instructor and others who were their own bosses. It made its impression.

Chaffin now is in his second year of his own mobile disk jockey business and telling other people about how he became his own boss.

"I don't think there's any secret," he said. "You've got to do what you know is right. I like the idea of being worth more than they're paying me and being able to prove it."

He was the one who suggested Wasinger take his class to this event, he said, when the two met while working their jobs at the same wedding.

Wasinger said this was his first trip to the K-State symposium, titled "Opportunities in Entrepreneurism: The Road to Success." Programs like these let students know they do not have to be 40 or 50 years old to start a business, Wasinger said.

"So much of starting a business is developing an idea and having the nerve to go through with it," he said. "This helps them understand anyone can do it."

Matt Phipps also was a panelist at the symposium. Phipps, junior in management information systems and owner of Wildcat Connection, said he began his online classified ad service because he wanted to keep advancing.

"I just really don't want to have a ceiling," he said.

Phipps said the symposium was the first time he really ever had given advice about his business instead of asking others for theirs.

"It's a lot of work, asking around and being around," he said.

The symposium brought in about 100 students from eight different high schools, SIFE adviser Domita Whitney-Bammerlin said.

She said the event, sponsored by SIFE, the College of Business Administration and dozens of corporate sponsors, is the second annual symposium organized by SIFE. Whitney-Bammerlin and SIFE President Julie Suellentrop said it was intended not only to help high school students and advisers looking into business, but also to present an image of K-State to prospective freshmen.

After an introduction and a question-and-answer period with the panel, guests broke into sessions on communications, marketing and promotions and operations management.

Sher Downing, junior at Atchison High School, said she was thinking about starting a coffee shop after college as she and her group tried to use random materials to create a product and a commercial to sell it. Downing said she came to the symposium to look for ideas on how to stay inspired and motivated.

Jacob Walls, sophomore at Atchison High School, was one of the winners for his creation, "the hammer light 2000."

"We just started putting things together," he said. You can't always be serious during business."

When his parents began a coffee shop back home, Walls said he wanted to learn more about the business in his daily life, as well as preparing for studies as a chiropractor.

"Part of that is communication skills and business. I want to learn the business side," he said.

Mary Tabakin, senior at Emporia High school, said she came to get a better look at the scenery.

"I wanted to come to this or KU and I thought the more I came, the easier it would be to decide," she said.

Fatalities increase on Kansas roads

By JASON BECK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

The Kansas Department of Transportation is working on studies to see if speed really does kill, after fatal accidents on Kansas highways and roads increased 17 percent since 1995.

After the speed limit increased in 1995, fatal accidents on Kansas non-interstate highways have increased 34 percent.

"It's hard for us to make a correlation between the increased speed limit and the increased fatalities right now," said Stan Whitley, an information specialist for KDOT.

Yacoub Najjar, K-State associate professor of civil engineering, is working on a study to see if the increase in speed limit actually has had any effect on the fatalities on Kansas highways.

Whitley said that once this study, looking at data from the past two years, is completed sometime next month, the state will have a better idea about any correlation.

"There's just not enough data to go on yet," Whitley said.

Whitley also said it was important to realize other factors must be taken into account. While Kansas fatalities have increased, the deaths per 100 million miles traveled has remained flat.

The rate in the 1980s ranged from 1.69 to 2.93 deaths per 100 million miles, while in the '90s it has ranged from 1.39 to 1.71.

"We've seen the fatalities rise continually for 20 years," Whitley said, "but we have more vehicles and more construction now."

One year might be a bad year for accidents, Whitley said, while another year might have extremely bad weather.

All these factors must be taken into account before any conclusions can be reached.

"It's just raw data," Whitley said.

K-State students, however, agree that non-interstate highways can be treacherous. Many people drive well above the posted speed limit, they said.

"Two-lane highways are more dangerous because people don't pay attention to what they're doing," said Clint Meredith, senior in accounting and finance.

Meredith is working as an intern in Hutchinson, Kan., and commutes from Manhattan to Hutchinson every weekend.

Meredith primarily drives on Interstate 70, Interstate 135 and Kansas Highway 61. He said Highway 61 is the most dangerous.

"The speed limit is 65," Meredith said, "but most people drive 70 or 75."

Dustin Barker, freshman in mechanical engineering, uses Kansas Highways 7 and 24 to drive to Kansas City.

He said he only does about 60 mph, but that the roads are not maintained very well.

Barker said he suggests better maintenance of the non-interstate highways and the addition of signs to warn drivers of coming turns at night.

Meredith said he agrees that driving on two-lane highways can be very difficult.

"It's more dangerous at night because of the hills," Meredith said. "You can't tell how much of the road you can actually see."

Brad Beach, junior in management information systems, said he thinks local traffic presents hazards as well as night driving.

Beach said local traffic, like tractors and cattle trucks, slows down traffic and that passing is difficult on the winding roads.

Meredith also said he thought that it actually could be more hazardous if you're familiar with the route.

"After you drive it a few times," he said, "you think you know every stretch and bent in the road, and you can get careless."

These students do not, however, think that reducing the speed limit would be an effective solution.

Council seeks graduate research

By TAMARA MANN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

The Graduate Student Council is announcing a call for papers.

Graduate students will be given the opportunity to present their research to peers in other departments at the campuswide research symposium April 14.

"If someone is interested in participating, they first should get the guidelines off of the GSC Web page," said Sam Garchik, graduate student in history and the forum's coordinator.

"Then they have to submit a proposal of what they are doing, which will be evaluated by the Graduate Research Forum Committee," he said.

The committee will notify the presenters of the presentation schedule and presenter guidelines. Presenters are allowed 15 minutes for their presentation and a question-and-answer session.

"Even though presenters are not required to hand in completed papers for the presentation, they most generally put all they have got into it," said Sara Dillingham, graduate student in student counseling and personal services and GSC president.

"It's a great experience to gain practice in presenting their research topic," she said.

Students not only will be able to participate in a valuable presentation experience, but they also could be awarded a monetary prize.

"There are usually five categories, with the top two in each receiving prizes," Dillingham said. "We are lucky to have financial support from the Graduate School to be able to conduct the forum and award prizes. First prize receives $75, and second $25."

Graduate students will be presenting their research to a panel of five judges who are graduate faculty or K-State students. Presenters are judged based on several aspects of their presentation and research.

Past criteria have included whether a layperson could interpret the presentation, if their objectives were clear, the delivery of their presentation and their ability to answer questions.

"There were several topics presented last year that were based on subjects that I was very unfamiliar with," Dillingham said. "Whether or not they were able to present the research in terms that people like myself could understand was one of the factors that went into the rating procedure."

Presenters are divided into groups of five people. Everyone within the group is judged by the same set of judges.

"I remember the most challenging aspect was trying to determine how the judges could differentiate between the wide variety of topics," said Brenda Mayberry, graduate student in curriculum and instruction and forum participant in 1997.

Previous topics have ranged from the theory of ground-penetrating radars to user perceptions of adjustable office chairs.

"I remember being greatly intrigued by a presentation given by an architecture student last year. There were pictures presented on slides from different places all over the world," Dillingham said. "It was very interesting."

Mayberry said the experience was a great way to learn how other fields related to what she was doing.

"Within the Graduate School, you usually hear bits and pieces of what your peers are doing. In terms of educating myself about what was going on in other fields and how they related to my field, the forum was a great experience," Mayberry said.

Those interested in participating should send abstracts to the Office of Student Activities and Services by March 17.

The princess is determined not to belong to any man, but her will is tested when Calaf, an unknown prince, arrives in the palace.

The Rivals†

Romance abounds in Richard Brinsley Sheridan's classic The Rivals. Heiress Lydia Languish is in love with Captain Jack Absolute, a.k.a. Ensign Beverly. Love is rarely simple, however, and the matchmaking machinations of the Captain's father and Lydia's aunt, Mrs. Malaprop, lead to delightful confusion. Throw in a pair of sentimental lovers, a bumbling suitor and a tempestuous Irishman, and you have the comic chaos that has delighted audiences since 1775.

Unpredictable weather delays flower planting

By CASSIDY HILL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Recent warm weather might push students to begin planting flowers for spring, but it probably still is too early to start.

Erin Shepek, freshman in horticulture, said it is too early to plant flowers because there still is a chance for frost and snow, which would destroy blooming plants.

"Right now is a little too early to plant flowers," Shepek said. "If the flowers are planted right now, this warm weather would make them bloom, but in a few weeks it could be snowing and then the blooms would be frozen and dead."

Ward Upham, K-State research extension associate, said it varies from flower to flower as to how much sunlight each flower needs and when to plant it for the spring.

"It depends on if the flowering plant is more of a cold, hearty plant," he said. "May 10 is the day that all most of the flowering plants need to be planted by in order for them to be fully in bloom for spring and summer."

Upham said pansies probably are the only flowers that could be planted at this point in the season. He said bulb flowers should be planted in the fall to help grow a root system.

"Flowers such as the pansies could be planted right now because they are more of a cold, hearty flower that can withstand cold temperatures," Upham said. "Bulbs such as tulips and daffodils need to be planted in the fall, around October. These flowers need a cold winter to spread their root system underneath the ground for the spring."

By May 10, most flowers and plants can be planted, Upham said. He said there are types of flowers that do not handle cold temperatures and planting them too early will lead to unsuccessful blooming.

"Hanging plants like the gladiolus needs to be planted before May 10 because they do not do well in the cold," he said. "They need full direct sunlight, however, most people hang them on their porch where they get indirect light, which is also all right."

Erin Hjetland, freshman in horticulture, said each plant and flower varies with how much sunlight it should receive.

"Usually, the flowering plants need six to eight hours of sunlight each day. However, it depends on the flower if it needs full sunlight, partial sunlight or shade," Hjetland said.

"In watering the flowers, the topsoil needs to be kept moist at all times, but do not drown the soil, because too much water could result in harm to the flower or plant."

Brian Murphy, junior in horticulture, said some flowers and plants want south sun and others want sun from the north.

"It varies with each flower as to how much sun they want and where to plant them," Murphy said.

"Kansas has more sun from the south, so those types of flowers, like bulbs, are more common than in Canada, which has more sun from the north."

Collegiate calendar competition now closed to public

By JENNIFER LAKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's a new year for the K-State Men's and Women's Collegiate Calendar, and with the new competition comes a new event procedure.

In the past, participants competed on stage in front of a panel of students and professionals. They also competed in front of hundreds of people who came to the Wareham Opera House to witness the competition and join in the party-like atmosphere.

Now, the competition will consist solely of a runway walk during an open call, publicly closed event, March 11 at Longhorn's. Those interested in participating can pick up applications at Longhorn's on Anderson Avenue.

Samantha Sandow, senior in journalism and mass communications and one of last year's finalists in the 1999-2000 calendar, said she was happy about the new change.

"I'm glad it's not in front of everyone anymore," Sandow said. "That's not my personality, and I probably wouldn't have done it again this year if it was the same. But now I'm going to do it again."

There also are some new faces on the judging panel this year, and students will not be included.

Jim Blakely, one of this year's judges and owner of James T. Blakely Photography, will be taking pictures the day of the competition and shooting the calendar when the finalists go to South Fork, Texas, in May. Blakely's credentials include, among others, a shoot for Cosmopolitan magazine.

J.J. Meier of California-based Face Finders, also will be judging the competition and will be scouting for talent along with Robin Voss of etalentbase.com, which manages a Web site for agents and clients.

"Face Finders is a national scout network that looks for people for photos, commercials, theaters and talent firms," Meier said. "We are always looking for people of all types. We see the calendar as a great opportunity to give those in Kansas a chance they may not have, not being on the coasts."

Firms such as etalentbase.com are follow-ups for scouting agencies like Face Finders.

They take the people found and create a protected Web site that has a picture and other useful information on it.

This saves time for agents, directors and producers, who now can look to see what they need and go directly to that person.

Bill Price, vice president of promotions and sponsorship for Collegiate Calendars, said the new procedure was needed to promote a healthy image.

"We never intended this to become a lewd contest, and it was beginning to get out of hand," Price said.

"We want the calendar to be the focus, not the competition each night."

Price said he hoped more people will feel comfortable auditioning this year.

"We want everyone to come out," Price said. "The companies we are working with are looking for all types of faces and shapes. Anyone interested, students, prospective students or alumni, should come. The only requirement is they have to be at least 18 years old."

Being the only licensed K-State calendar, it's important to keep the calendar in good taste, Price said.

"It's supposed to be fun," he said. "And it still will be, because that is the main point, and we will continue to do that above all else."

UPC to sponsor presidential debate

Candidates face off in discussion of issues

By JENNIFER GIER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The race is on and presidential candidates are preparing to take the podium in a debate sponsored by the Union Program Council.

Presidential candidates make a two-minute speeches about their ideas at noon Thursday in the Union Courtyard.

Justin VanNest, senior in political science, will moderate.

He said eight of the nine candidates have committed to the debate.

The debate will be this year's first and only debate scheduled for the presidential candidates at the Union.

However, most of the candidates debated on KSDB-FM 91.9 Monday night.

All the candidates except Rick Wooten and Aaron Shea, student body presidential and vice presidential candidates, were represented at the radio station's debate.

"We were told to be in today (Tuesday) at 5:45," Shea said. "It was my understanding that the radio station was splitting the candidates into two groups — one group last night and one group tonight."

Jake Worcester and Dana Pracht also were not present at the debate, but Travis Lenkner, their campaign manager, debated in place of the pair.

Candidates said the debate in the Union Courtyard is one of the most important events in the campaign race, because in past years, large numbers of students have attended the debates.

Student Body Vice President Gabe Eckert participated in the debate last year.

"I think the debate is beneficial to the candidates, because that gives the students an opportunity to listen to the candidates speak about their issues," he said.

Bush wins Virginia primary, receives all delegates

By RON FOURNIER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ARLINGTON, Va. — George W. Bush forged a winning coalition of Republican regulars and the religious right Tuesday to deal John McCain a resounding defeat in Virginia. Even as next week's 13-state presidential showdown loomed, the Texas governor declared, "We are one step closer to having a united party."

The see-sawing Republican presidential race was fought also in North Dakota and Washington state, but Bush won the bulk of the day's delegates, 56, in the capital of the old Confederacy.

"I've proven I can bring Republicans out in big numbers," Bush told The Associated Press in a telephone interview. In a slap at McCain, who blasted evangelical leaders Pat Robertson and Jerry Falwell on Monday, the governor told supporters in Cincinnati, "We are expanding our base without destroying our foundations."

Sounding tired but defiant, McCain told his backers in Bakersfield, Calif., "My opponent wants to be president in the worst way. I want to be president in the best way." With the pink evening sun dipping beneath an American flag serving as his backdrop, McCain said, "We're still the underdog. Don't forget it. But we're going to win Tuesday."

The Texas governor won because Republican voters overwhelmed independents and Democrats who crossed party lines in support of McCain, a warning sign for the Arizona senator as he prepares for New York, California and 11 other states conducting GOP contests.

One day after McCain labeled certain evangelical leaders "agents of intolerance," religious conservatives accounted for 20 percent of the Virginia vote.

They backed Bush 8-to-1, prompting the governor to say, "The voters of Virginia rejected the politics of pitting one religion against another."

McCain's best showing was in the Washington suburbs, the most moderate region in the state, according to surveys of Virginia voters conducted by Voter News Service, a consortium of the AP and television networks. Bush beat him elsewhere.

On the Democratic side, Bill Bradley and Vice President Al Gore squared off in Washington state. No delegates were at stake, but the former New Jersey senator hoped for a symbolic victory to breathe life into his troubled campaign.

My Favorite Workout

Stephanie Settle, a senior in secondary math education, uses the Rec as her stress reliever. A student teacher at Riley County High School, Settle has had to make coming to the Rec a top priority. "It's hard to motivate myself to go to the Rec. When I come home at night from teaching, I'm tired and I have lessons to plan. But, having someone to go with makes it easier," Settle said. "I usually go with my roommate Jaylene. It gives us time to talk and it energizes me."

Although Settle's preferred mode of exercise is intramurals, especially flag football, she uses the indoor Rec facilities in the winter due to the cold weather.

The Overland Park, Kan. native visits the Rec four to five times a week. She walks and runs on the elevated track. Then she moves into the circuit training area and lifts weights. Settle has participated in the Rec Services' programs since she was a freshman.

"I'd rather play sports than run around a track," she said.

Working It Out

Spring Break is fast approaching! To help you get into shape, we offer 33 exercise sessions per week. Join us in the multipurpose room and enjoy the variety of sessions we offer daily from 6:30AM - 8:25PM.

Beginning level exercise sessions:
Body Blast - an intense entry-level step class offering basic choreography. Burns a base level of fat.
Body Blast - a total body workout for the entire body that brings the weight room into the aerobic room. It involves free weight training that will increase your lean body mass, muscle tone and definition, and raise your resting metabolic rate to help burn fat.
Intermediate level exercise session: Some knowledge is recommended. High and low options will be demonstrated periodically.
WFL - combines a high and low impact floor workout with energetic choreography. IM Step - offers fun and challenging footwork to increase exercise intensity using 6" or 8" benches.
Warm Training - strength and endurance workout alternating sets of sport specific skills including sprints, jump ropes, obstacle training, etc. (similar to interval or circuit).
Aerobic - combinations of aerobics, step aerobics and toning.
Circuit Plus - kickboxing moves incorporated on the bench to offer a higher intensity workout.

Advanced level exercise session: Previous experience is strongly recommended.
Turbo Step - fast paced, advanced step and choreography. Prior experience is recommended.
Kardoback - high intensity interval art based aerobic workout using punches, jabs and kicks.
WFL - high intensity interval training alternating 30 second increments of extreme aerobic training and lower intensity movements to include jogging, spinning, jump ropes, bike, step workout and toning.

Nutrition Notes

Fad diets are still taking the population by storm. While these programs are a quick fix that usually brings more harm than good, people are still enticed by the results. They are overwhelmed by the weight loss, but do not take the time to consider what this extreme diet is doing to the rest of their body. Ideally, you want to choose a program that offers a lifelong plan. There are no easy answers to changing your weight. It is a matter of developing healthier eating and exercising habits. Look at what you eat, how it compares with the Food Guide Pyramid, and examine food portions. If it sounds too good to be true, it usually is. Eliminating food groups or not combining certain foods only decreases variety and nutrition, not weight. Buying special weight loss products and supplements only decreases the weight of your wallet, not the weight on the scale. So, develop a plan for change and start one step at a time.

Fitness Facts

People always question whether or not they should exercise when sick. If you have a cold or feel one coming on, it won't hurt to exercise. As long as your symptoms are "above the neck," keep exercising - but at a less intense level. However, if you are coughing extensively or have a fever, it's best to rest up until you are feeling up to par. www.fitnesslink.com

Who's Who

Do you love working outdoors? Then Doug Buseman, a sophomore in graphic design, has your dream job. Buseman is a member of the Outdoor Rental Center (ORC) staff. The Riley, Kan. native gets the playfields ready for intramural competition, works in the ORC, and much more.

Buseman, who has worked as a member of ORC staff for a year and a half, needed a job that complemented his school hours. The ORC position was perfect for his needs.

"I'd rather be outside than cooped up in an office," Buseman said.

Buseman's favorite thing about working on ORC staff is the variety his job presents him.

"I'm not doing the same thing everyday," he said. "As Outdoor Rental Center staff, we do lots of different jobs."

Linda Kanak, a sophomore in marketing and international business, began working for the Rec as an accounting assistant in the business office in January 2000. As an accounting assistant, Kanak assists with payroll paperwork, paying bills, keeping employee files updated and other general clerical work.

Kanak, from Atwood, Kan., applied to work at the Rec as facility staff. She was surprised when the Rec wanted to interview her for the accounting assistant position that was recently vacant.

"I used to work at the bank in Atwood and at the Fort Hays State University Dean's office, so I had some experience," Kanak said.

Kanak is enjoying being a Rec employee and is learning a lot in the few short months she has worked.

"I like the people I work with and the atmosphere in the business office," Kanak said. "I'm always busy, there's always something going on or people coming and going."

SGA evaluates Student Senate representation

By DANEDRI THOMPSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Heath Schroeder, junior in business administration, said he wanted students and senators to know that some students feel like they aren't being represented in Senate.

"I think something is apparently wrong," Schroeder said. "That's why we only have a certain amount of people voting and a certain amount of people running."

He said he spread the message by talking to Student Senate at one of its meetings earlier in the semester.

"Sometimes it takes just one person to get the spark started," Schroeder said.

Dustin Petrik, Senate operations chair, said Schroeder's speech on the Senate floor sparked Senate to examine its representation. It's also an issue that several candidates for student body president and vice president said is important to their campaigns.

Petrik said the Senate Operations Committee researched the issue and found that, among Big 12 Conference and peer schools, there are three different ways of distributing Senate seats.

"There wasn't a dominant way of doing it," Petrik said. "That was one of the main things we were able to see."

He said in about one-third of the Big 12 and peer institution schools, Senate seats were distributed by colleges as they are at K-State. Another third of the schools split the Senate seats between colleges and living arrangements. A final third distributed seats in a variety of ways, he said.

Petrik said his committee couldn't determine which way worked best from that.

"Just because there's a seat for a non-traditional student, you can't tell if there's someone running for that position or if those students are really being represented," he said.

The committee specifically looked at having specialty seats, but decided against it, he said.

"We thought having specialty seats was sort of micromanaging things," Petrik said. "The problem was, where do you stop?"

The group decided the current system works best for K-State.

"The fairest way to distribute seats is by college. That's because the entire University is organized by college," he said. "The funding goes from the university level to the college level."

But Jewel Harris, director of multicultural programming and services, said Senate should reconsider specialty seats.

"In a system where you have this population of minority students who are not being represented, that might be one of a few viable options to address the issue," she said.

Bill Muir, faculty representative to Student Senate, said specialty seats aren't the key to minority and independent representation. Encouraging people to run for the positions available is, however.

"I've seen minorities, off-campus students and Greeks get elected over the years," he said. "They get elected for who they are, not what they are."

Jake Worcester, student body presidential candidate, said he agreed.

"We need to work harder at recruiting those groups who are under-represented," he said. "We definitely need to target those students."

He said the real advantage of the system now is that every student is represented equally by their academic majors, but he can see why some students are concerned.

"There's no question that we're not very diverse. Changing representation might not be the best way to accomplish that, though," he said.

Jeremy Clays, student body president, said he would create a standing committee in Senate for minority affairs, if elected.

"This is the place to start," he said. "It isn't the end. This is just a step so minorities feel comfortable coming to Senate."

Clays said his goal would be for the committee eventually to become obsolete.

"This is just a step so minorities feel comfortable coming to Senate," he said. "Then, someday this step won't be necessary."

Korri Hall, Black Student Union president, said she would rather see specialty seats than have a standing

Senate seats in 2 colleges open for write-in ballots

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two colleges do not have anyone running for Student Senate — the College of Architecture and the College of Veterinary Medicine.

The Graduate School only has three people running for eight available seats.

"All other colleges have more people running than there are spots available," Jeff Meder, Election Committee member, said.

The College of Architecture has two seats available, and the College of Veterinary Medicine has one seat.

Students in these colleges, as well as the other colleges, can write-in candidates when they vote, though, said Travis Morgan, election committee chair.

To vote for a write-in candidate, students will need to go to KATS and follow the voting directions. Before students actually vote, a screen will come up giving them the option of a write-in ballot or electronic ballot.

After choosing the write-in ballot and filling in the write-in candidates, print off a copy of the ballot that has a verified signature and take it to the Office of Student Activities and Services on the ground floor of the K-State Student Union.

Morgan said if voters choose the electronic version ballot, they will not be able to write in a candidate.

"And if you choose to get on the electronic ballot and then decide you want to write in someone, you're too late," he said.

The official number of students on the ballot for Senate seats is 98, which is down from 110 after some candidates didn't make it to mandatory meetings.

However, Meder said this number probably will change after Brandon Bowers, freshman in electrical engineering, talks with his former high school guidance counselor, Larry Laas from Concordia High School. Bowers and other Concordia students discussed with Laas ways that their hometown school could better prepare high school students for college life.

Former student FEEDBACK

Principals, counselors visit campus, erstwhile students

Time spent talking with a high school principal used to mean trouble.

K-State's 48th annual Principal/Counselor/Student Conference, which took place Wednesday in the K-State Student Union and Ahearn Field House, gave K-State students a chance to talk with these authority figures outside the walls of a principal's office.

Michelle Haupt, assistant director of admissions, said the conference started as a way to aid Kansas high schools in formulating curriculums for their students.

"It began as an opportunity to provide feedback to the high schools on how they could better prepare their students," she said.

Haupt said the conference was beneficial to the 106 high schools that participated because of the information that principals and guidance counselors received from conference visitors.

"It's an outlet for students to tell their high school administrators about their K-State experience," she said.

Surveys distributed to K-State students visiting with their counselors included questions about math, science and electives available at their former high schools.

These surveys help officials of Kansas high schools determine how to best prepare their students for higher education, said Larry Laas, a guidance counselor at Concordia High School.

"I'll go back and type these surveys up so counselors and administrators can go over them," he said. "These will be put to good use when we make changes to the curriculum."

Laas said input from former students also lets school officials know what programs to leave alone.

"Not only does it give us ideas about how to change, but it gives us positive reinforcement about what we've already done," he said.

Suggestions from former Concordia High School students included advice for incoming freshmen who are looking for an easy transition to college life.

"I came over because I thought it would help people in the future," said Brandon Bowers, a former student of Concordia High and freshman in electrical engineering.

Lora Duis, also from Concordia High and a sophomore in secondary education, said she would advise all incoming freshman to show interest in extracurricular activities at K-State.

"They should try to get involved, and try to meet as many people as possible," she said. "When I first came here, I didn't know anyone."

Prairie women focus of March activities

By JENNIFER HOTCHKISS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Women's contributions no longer are being forgotten.

Similar to African American history, women's history virtually was unknown until 1978, when a nonprofit organization formed Women's History Week.

Since then, Congress has designated the entire month of March as Women's History Month.

K-State began celebrating women's history in the 1970s, and has continued to organize special programming every March with the aid of the K-State Women's Center and others on campus, said Susan Allen, director of the Women's Center.

Allen said she became involved with promoting women's history to help make society more just.

"I had the good fortune to attend school throughout the Civil Rights Movements, including the women's movement," she said. "It was as if, at some point in the 1960s, women began saying 'Excuse me, I think you forgot us.'"

Allen said history looks different when the contributions of women are included. Knowing one's history is a primary tool for securing one's freedom, she said.

This year's celebration will teach women about their contributions to society by focusing on the history of Kansas prairie women. The public is encouraged to attend these free events co-sponsored by UFM, the Kansas Rural Center and the Kansas Humanities Council.

The first event will feature Washington, D.C., photographer Cynthia Vagnetti. She will lead a photographic seminar, "Gifts and Graces of the Land," on Friday in the K-State Student Union.

Excerpts from diaries of pioneer women will be presented by Ann Liston, chair of the history department at Fort Hays State University, on Tuesday. "Done My Work and Sewed Some: Pioneer Women's Diaries," will be at 7 p.m. in the Union Big 12 Room.

The final speaker, Susan Anne Carlson, will talk about hysteria and other forms of madness, reportedly epidemic, among Kansas prairie women, Allen said. Carlson, associate professor of English at Pittsburg State University, will present "Women and Madness on the Kansas Frontier," at 7 p.m. March 28 in the Union Flint Hills Room.

"I thought it would be interesting to bring in speakers who could share some of the experiences of Kansas rural women," Charlene Brownson,

1st-grade shooter uses gun found at 'flophouse'

By NEDRA PICKLER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MOUNT MORRIS TOWNSHIP, Mich. — The 6-year-old boy who killed a first-grade classmate used a stolen gun he apparently discovered loaded and lying around in a bedroom at the flophouse where he was living, investigators said Wednesday.

Authorities focused on possible criminal charges against any adults who gave the boy access to the .32-caliber pistol he used to shoot 6-year-old Kayla Rolland on Tuesday morning, a day after the two apparently had scuffled on the playground at Buell Elementary School.

The boy is too young to understand what he was doing and probably won't be charged, the prosecutor said.

After the shooting, the boy put the gun in his desk and went to the school office, Superintendent Ira Rutherford said. After police questioned him, Police Chief Eric King said, he sat there drawing pictures.

"He is a victim in many ways," Genesee County Prosecutor Arthur Busch said. "It is very sad. We need to put our arms around him and love him."

Busch said the house where the boy and his 8-year-old brother were staying with an uncle was frequented by strangers, and the boy's father — who

Teen receives jail sentence for suffocating newborn son

JUNCTION CITY—A tearful 16-year-old girl who prosecutors said panicked after giving birth was sentenced to four years and seven months in prison for suffocating her newborn son in a trash bag.

"I am very sorry for what happened," Jessica Lytle said Wednesday, during her sentencing in Geary County District Court. "Now I'm here to accept responsibility for what I've done."

The infant, Garrett Michael Lytle, was found Nov. 30 in Lyons Creek, south of Junction City.

Lytle and her 18-year-old boyfriend, Jeffrey Moretti, pleaded no contest to one count each of voluntary manslaughter Feb. 7. Moretti, 17 at the time of the baby's death, is scheduled to be sentenced March 13.

Geary County Attorney Chris Biggs said Lytle gave birth at Moretti's house after becoming sick at school. After that, Biggs said, the two panicked because they didn't feel they could handle being parents.

"There had to be accountability for what happened," Biggs said. "Obviously, there was a lot of evidence about the lack of a (criminal) history on the part of the defendants, and also their age was something that had to be taken into consideration ... but there had to be accountability."

Fire destroys apartment, leaves Brownback homeless

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback was among those evacuated when a fire broke out before dawn Wednesday in his Capitol Hill apartment building.

No one was hurt in the fire, which began about 4:30 a.m. The structure was ruled uninhabitable.

Brownback, who rents a first-floor apartment with Rep. Jim DeMint, R-S.C., joked that he now is a homeless senator, although he said several friends have offered him rooms.

Among them are Sen. John Ashcroft, R-Mo., and his wife, Janet, who live down the street and were awakened by the sirens.

Brownback said he'll probably take Ashcroft up on the offer.

"I don't know what rent he's going to charge," Brownback said, smiling.

District of Columbia firefighters are blaming the blaze on flammable items near a heater in a third-floor apartment. Flames spread to the second and fourth floors, at one point shooting into the sky.

Death row inmate set free due to prosecution mistake

HOUSTON — A man who spent 16 years on death row for the stabbing of his former roommate was ordered freed by a federal judge Wednesday because prosecutors missed a deadline for keeping him behind bars.

However, the judge did not bar prosecutors from retrying Calvin Jerold Burdine, 46.

Last year, U.S. District Judge David Hittner threw out Burdine's conviction because his lawyer slept through long stretches of his 1984 trial. Hittner gave prosecutors 120 days to give Burdine a new trial or set him free. That time ran out in late January, and on Wednesday, Hittner ordered Burdine released from prison within five days.

The judge said the state must adhere to the same rules as defendants.

"A similar procedural error by defense counsel in a capital case could result in a defendant's execution," Hittner said.

The state attorney general's office did not immediately return calls for comment.

Burdine was convicted of the 1983 slaying of W.T. Wise, 50, a former housemate. Burdine told police that he had argued with Wise and moved out of their trailer because Wise wanted him to work as a prostitute.

Evidence showed Burdine and an accomplice, Douglas McCreight, were involved in the burglary in which Wise was stabbed. McCreight served eight years in prison for a lesser crime before he was paroled.

Burdine said in an interview last month that if released he could make his home nearby at Lake Livingston or go to Oklahoma.

"The state of Texas don't have to worry about Calvin Burdine," he said. "We've got 80 acres in Oklahoma and I can get out there and fish and relax — out of sight and out of mind. I don't want them to think I'm going to roar down those streets and in those bars. I'm not like that anymore."

Photo phun. The Union Program Council's Arts Committee is sponsoring a photo contest for students, faculty and staff at K-State.

The photos will be on display in the K-State Student Union art gallery until March 10.

Heide McBride, UPC program adviser, said the contest happens every year.

McBride said there were four categories in which the photos were judged.

The categories included building structures and landscapes, people, animals and still photos.

The photos were judged by three community members.

McBride said the photos were judged on several different criteria.

Some of the criteria included technical quality, presentation and division placement.

There were prizes given out for each category.

McBride said first and second place prizes were awarded in building structures and landscapes and stills.

The people category had two photos tie for first place.

No prizes were given out in the animal category.

Other photos, including first place, second place and honorable mention, the judges picked out are on display in the Union.

Some contestants entered a photo they already had entered in a different contest.

This gave them the opportunity to compare how the photo did in each contest.

"Both of the ones were ones I had already entered, they were in my collection," said Lana McCarthy, sophomore in pre-psychology.

"I think it is interesting to enter pictures in different contests because sometimes you will place and other times you won't," she said.

McCarthy said some adjustments could be made to improve the contest.

"I'd like to see more categories for entries and the judges seemed to be limited," McCarthy said.

"It was a good contest for the art gallery," she said.

Lecture-class reform tops issues for Teach, Burkin

By LYNNE HERMANSEN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jared Teach and Stan Burkin said they are quality people reaching for a quality goal. They plan on only making promises they can keep.

"We are setting lots of goals, and we are going to achieve as much as possible. We are trying to get things started," Burkin said.

Teach, student body presidential candidate and junior in public relations, has served as vice president of internal affairs for his fraternity, along with many other leadership positions.

Burkin, junior in human resource management and marketing, served as his fraternity's social chair and public relations chair in the past.

Their main issue for the campaign is to better lecture classes so they help the students rather than hurt them.

The candidates said they want overwhelming lecture classes to be made easier by adding extensive study reviews or labs.

"Not all lecture classes need this. We want to ease the pain of the harder ones that the majority of students have difficulties with," Teach said.

He said an increasing concern is the qualification of graduate teaching assistants. Teach and Burkin said the situation can be helped by looking at GTAs individually and creating some type of test.

Tuition is another concern, they said, but not as highly ranked as the others.

"We know that we can't solve the tuition problem in just a year," Teach said. "Perhaps, though, by trying to do something about it, we can help future students."

Burkin said lighting and the issue of campus safety is a unique part of their campaign.

"We want to add them to the crosswalks and where we need them," Burkin said. "The lesser chance of attackers, the better."

Teach and Burkin said the parking problem needs a solution. Believing that a shuttle service could serve the campus better, they want to help get it started.

"Parking is a continuing problem," Burkin said. "Lines of cars wait for the next person to pull out of their parking spot so they can grab the spot before everyone else."

Teach said parking is a situation that always will need improvements. Their main focus is to help ease the congestion of traffic around campus.

"Parking cannot be fixed that easily. Students will keep coming, and new parking problems will rise over time," Teach said. "We just want to do what we can now."

Teach and Burkin said they also want to give students the luxury of a fall break.

"Fall break is on many students' mind right now," Teach said. "It would be nice to work it in somewhere. It's not one of our main issues, but it is something to think about."

The two said they also would like to update benefits to better serve students' needs.

"We are privileged to have a system like KATS. We just want to make it the best possible," Teach said.

They said adding payment options for parking tickets, campus services and tuition could save students time and energy.

"Setting up appointments with Lafene would be a major time saver," Burkin said.

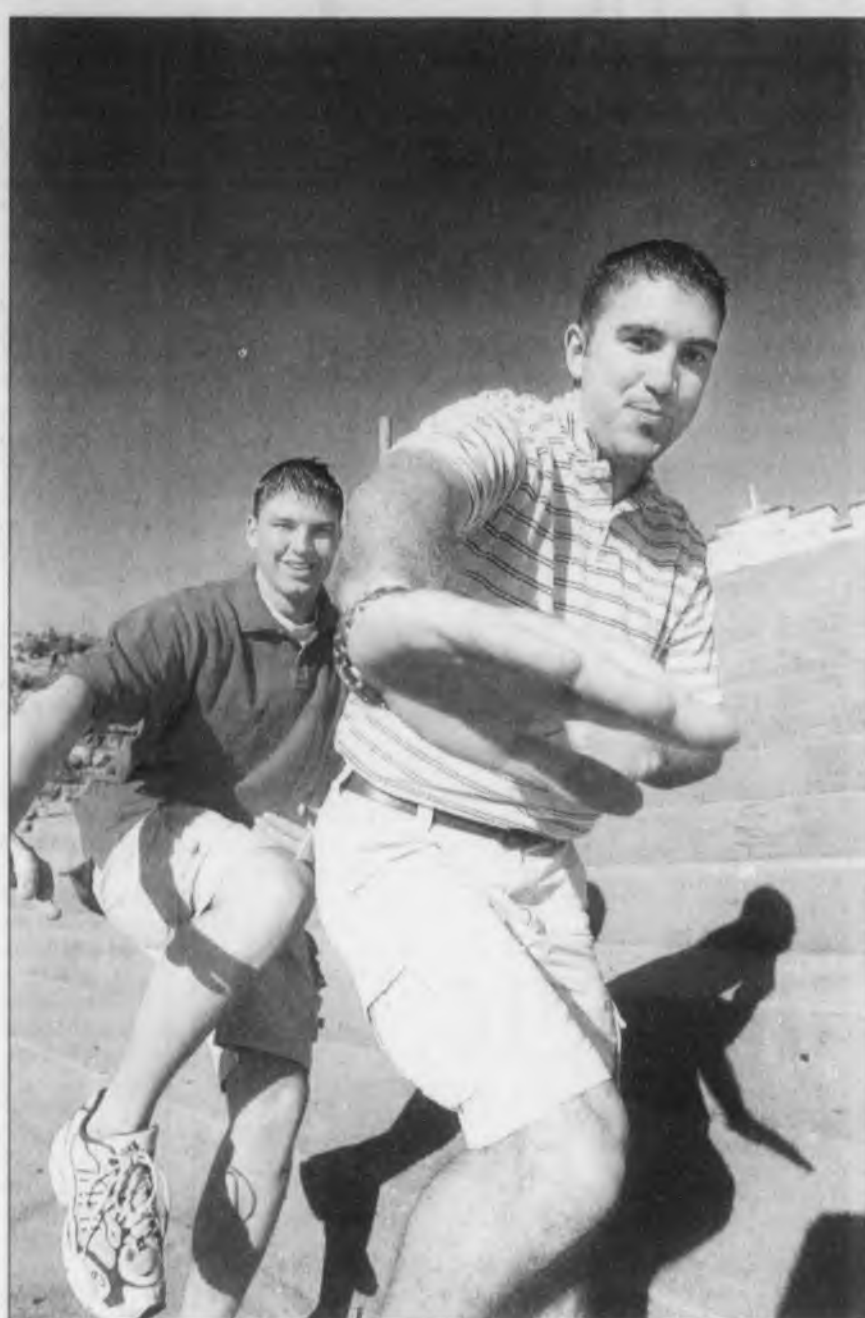

They said they would address some issues of their campaign such as education, fall break and KATS during their term. Their other issues, including parking, tuition and lighting, would be continuing projects that they would help promote and start.

Teach and Burkin said they are average students who are well-suited to represent K-State.

"We are not your typical candidates. We are easy to talk to," Burkin said. "We are the typical college students. We have great ideas and great support."

Campus lighting concerns student body presidential candidates

By LYNNE HERMANSEN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jared Teach and Stan Burkin said lights help guide students through the dark and help them feel safer.

Lighting structures and campus safety is a focus and concern of several presidential candidates.

Lighting is an important component to ensure safety for all students at K-State, said Teach and Burkin, student body presidential and vice presidential candidates.

As part of their platform, Teach and Burkin would like to improve the lighting system if elected.

"We don't plan on having big costs in implementing this," Burkin said.

The two want to add more emergency blue lights to help make the campus safer.

The blue lights have call boxes attached to them so students can call the police in an emergency. In addition, the pair said they would like to add yellow caution lights at crosswalks.

"Can you walk around campus and point out where all the blue lights are? It perhaps could be beneficial to have a map, which includes locations of the blue lights," Teach said. "Knowing where they are can save time when a student is desperately searching for one."

However, not everyone agrees that there is a lack of quality lights on campus. Director of K-State Police Ronnie Grice said they have had no serious problems on campus this year.

"We have had a good year. It's been quiet," Grice said.

Grice said he thinks the campus has adequate lighting, and any problems related to lighting are small.

"Lighting is a concern, but we never received any complaints," Grice said.

He said surveys are given to assess the quality of lighting in the beginning of the fall and spring semesters. The surveys also help in locating where lights are most needed on campus, he said.

"If there are areas of concern, the issue needs to be addressed and the problem fixed before the candidates give their platforms for elections," Grice said.

Several candidates said they agree that the regular lighting around campus is inadequate. The main concerns are the emergency blue lights and lights at crosswalks.

Jeremy Claeys and Amy Metzinger are two other candidates who also are focusing on lighting as part of their campaign.

Claeys said near Ahearn Field House, a yellow emergency box has been torn from the light pole and now dangles off of two wires.

Incidents such as this give presidential candidates a reason to make lighting a platform, he said.

"I just noticed the damaged box recently," Claeys said. "If something like this is not fixed immediately, it's too late."

It's imperative to maintain them."

Crosswalk lights need to be added at streets such as Denison and Manhattan avenues, Metzinger said. Students have gotten hit by cars at crosswalks that were not well lit, she said, and a push-button system that warns drivers that a student is at the crosswalk could help avoid such accidents.

"Lighting is always beneficial. It helps those students who are going to the dorms and students who are coming over to campus to use the Union or for review sessions," Metzinger said.

Steve Hall, student body presidential candidate, said lighting improvements are made continually every year. Last year more lighting was added by the residence halls and the Kramer Dining Center.

"I think lighting is a concern," Hall said. "The most needed areas would be around crosswalks. Every year we need to add more and more lights."

The funding from lighting is supported by the City/University Tax Fund. The sales tax received by the university is given to lighting and safety on campus.

Claeys and Metzinger said they plan to use funds from the city/university project fund to support lighting if elected.

"The city is slow to respond," Claeys said. "If we make it a priority, perhaps we could get the city to pay attention and respond."

Aggieville needs nonalcoholic alternatives

Nonalcoholic entertainment in Aggieville would be nice.

The recent decision to not build a miniature golf course in Aggieville's empty lot between The Futon Store and Speedwash Laundry loses an easy opportunity to provide nonalcoholic entertainment in Manhattan's most visited attraction.

With that in mind, Aggieville has turned from the local shopping district for which it once was known to the local party scene, and nothing more.

Granted, drinking is fine and dandy if you're 21 years of age, but if you're not, well...

Exactly. There is more to be desired in Aggieville if you're underage or even not interested in drinking.

Oddly enough, there are some people who don't always want to drink like fish, and to accommodate those K-State students, nonalcoholic activities sorely are needed.

In fact, Manhattan is hurting for nonalcoholic entertainment as a whole, and Aggieville would be a good place to begin looking for some.

K-State head baseball coach Mike Clark, who chose to postpone construction of the putt-putt course because a fellow financial backer withdrew, had the right idea when he proposed a nonalcoholic activity.

Obviously, the Aggieville bars have thrived, and other business endeavors have failed. If there must be another bar, please offer something the others don't.

Aggieville is full of bars that, frankly, look the same. Perhaps a new entrepreneur could offer a bar that featured a large concert area.

Make Aggieville what it used to be and what made it so great, for the Manhattan community, K-State and tourists.

morality found in logic (not religion)

People should judge morality by productive, harmonious behaviors

In the following I present a clear, concise, logical and reasonable basis for an objective set of moral truths without a godly presence. Moreover, I demonstrate one cannot derive objective morality through religion alone.

Much of the discourse during the past several weeks in the Collegian, as well as across campus, has revolved around the belief that true morality only can be found through God, more specifically, the Christian God. The Christian line of reasoning is their particular interpretation (or misinterpretation) of the Christian Bible is the absolute truth because God said so and no one can say any different.

It widely is believed that, without the existence of God, no objective morality can exist. This line of reasoning is not reasoning at all. It's simple-minded, self-righteous blind faith.

Moreover, this line of anti-intellectualism has shown to be both dangerous and deadly. Simple-minded, self-righteous blind faith has, among other things, justified the Crusades, the Spanish Inquisition, anti-Semitism, slavery, white supremacy, male chauvinism, homophobia and the decimation of New World cultures. It also has been used to dismiss many natural phenomena highly supported by scientific evidence such as a heliocentric solar system, radioactive dating and evolution.

Simple-minded, self-righteous blind faith is not the sole anti-intellectual property of Christianity. Religious zealots in the Middle East and the Asian subcontinent are inciting hatred and fighting between Jews and Muslims, Muslims and Muslims (i.e. Sunnis vs. Shi'ites) and Hindus and Muslims, all of whom believe they have the absolute truth of God.

When you try to tell these religious zealots they are wrong, even within the context of their own religion, their response is that their understanding of God's will is the sole correct understanding and what others believe to be true is dead wrong. Just try having a discussion with Fred Phelps sometime and you'll see what I mean.

With as many interpretations of a religion as there are people within that religion (with many of these interpretations contradictory to one another), who is to say which is the correct one God wants us to follow?

However, through logic and reasoning, the true objective moral code for human behavior can be revealed.

Homo sapiens are living creatures. A common characteristic among all living organisms, be it animal (including humans), plant, fungus, protozoa or bacteria is that their primary physical purpose in life is to survive long enough to produce viable offspring. In a means to accomplish this, each species exists within a specific ecological niche under specific environmental conditions. Within these environmental conditions, there exists an optimal environmental condition in which each species thrives best.

Take, for example, the bacteria raised in my lab for various biochemical experiments. These bacteria grow best when they are placed in an incubator at a specific temperature with various specific nutrients and in a specific oxygen/carbon/nitrogen atmosphere.

This is the objective optimal environment for these bacteria. Variation of any of these environmental conditions away from the optimal and the bacteria will grow less well.

This analogy is equally true for humans. Humans, unlike bacteria, also are social creatures. An addition to an optimal physical environment, there also exists an optimal social environment, both of which are required for human beings to thrive most efficiently.

Human beings thrive best in a social environment that is harmonious and conducive to being productive. Human behavior which promotes productivity and harmony is, in an objective sense, morally good. Behavior that impedes productivity and harmony is, in an objective sense, morally bad.

Thus, behaviors such as murder, theft and cutting in line at the theater are morally bad because they degrade the fabric of a productive harmonious society. Murder is more of a moral outrage than cutting in line because murder degrades the social fabric to a greater extent than line cutting.

The behaviors of mutual respect and love are, in an objective sense, morally good because they promote social harmony.

The greatness of Jesus is that he made the intellectual leap of making Leviticus 19:18, "You must love your neighbor as you love yourself," the prime and central idea within his philosophy of social behavior. Since logically nothing promotes social harmony greater than love, this appeal from Jesus is to the mind, not the heart nor the popular biblical misinterpretation of the day.

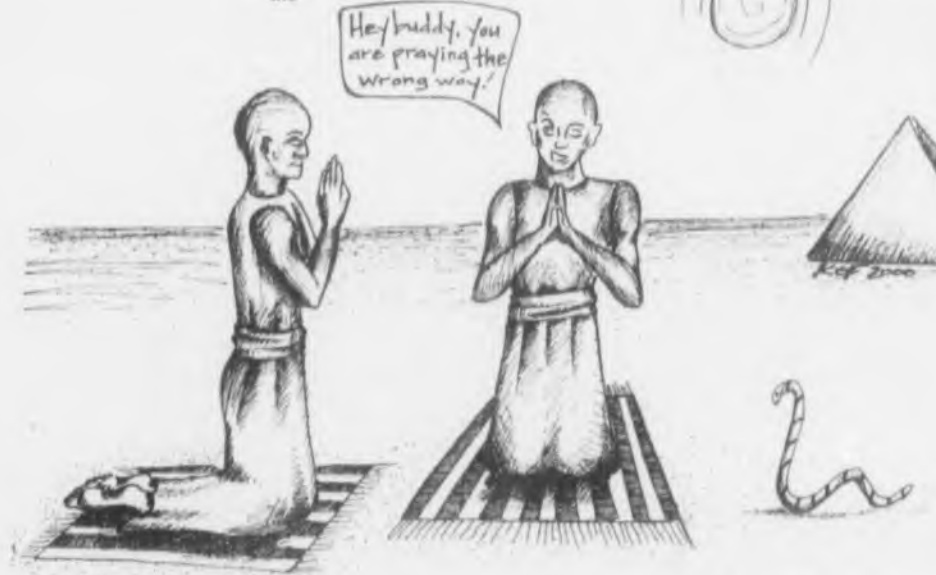

With its infinite number of moral interpretations (and a person for each believing that their personal interpretation is the sole correct one), religiously derived morality is no morality at all. Religion at best only can serve as a moral guide to the greater objective morality (as stipulated above) that exists outside of religion.

This is not a proof that God does or does not exist, but assuming there is a God, He/She/It created us with an intellect. It would be in our best interest to use it.

Teach, Burkin focus on 3 areas: education, tuition cost, lighting

Jared Teach and Stan Burkin are running for student body president and vice president for many reasons that other candidates are not.

We consider ourselves typical college students who have witnessed virtually every viewpoint of college life. This is the idea we want everyone to understand. We want it known we are not different from anyone else and definitely are not politicians. We are students who have gathered ideas from our experiences and taken note of the concerns of the majority of college students.

We are running not because it is expected of us, but because we love our university and have quality ideas that need to be addressed.

We have focused our efforts on three main areas. These include education, tuition and lighting. We believe these issues are the most crucial at K-State and must be addressed immediately.

Many students believe classes at K-State are overcrowded or extremely demanding. We agree. We feel as if the larger, more difficult classes either should be broken down into smaller classes, or include labs or study sessions for all students. This would give more one-on-one interaction between students and instructors, most likely resulting in better understanding of material and better grades.

Our next issue is tuition. The first thing we must understand is tuition increases and decreases are not determined by the student body president and vice president. Our job is to represent K-State students and their thoughts. We definitely are in favor of slowing down the rise of tuition, but feel as if a total tuition freeze is not the answer. We all must realize that if we are in search of a quality education, we are going to have to pay a quality price. The Teach and Burkin campaign believes if tuition is on the rise, financial aid should be on the rise as well.

Lighting is another of our concerns: not necessarily the sidewalk lights, but the other lights we regularly do not think about. We believe it is imperative we add more emergency blue lights on our campus to ensure the safety of our students. Yellow caution lights on Manhattan and Denison avenues are additions we would like to see made possible.

Finally, we would like to thank our sponsors — Lucky Brew/Grille, Pizza Hut, Dean Retail Liquor.

Please keep us in your thoughts when voting next week. Thank you.

Wooten, Shea look to restore confidence in SGA for students Dream it today. Do it tomorrow. This simple slogan is how your fellow students and friends, Rick Wooten and Aaron Shea, want to approach the offices of student body president and vice president.

Several issues remain unresolved that the next Student Governing Association leaders will need to address. Library funding, salary increases and a realistic parking solution all are problems that need to be solved.

I also am concerned with issues that are important to us and many other students. The current system being used to elect senators to SGA is flawed. Clearly, there is underrepresentation of some groups and overrepresentation of others. To put it simply, our election process needs to be changed.

The campus we call home needs to be improved. The focal point of our plan for overall campus beautification would be the free-speech zone. What now is a giant pointless curb would be a majestic fountain, part of a place students would be proud to call home.

Tom Asbury. Where do I begin? Zero wins vs. the Chickenhawks. Eleven consecutive losses. Basically, we need to relieve Thomas of his duties and find a new coach, an issue we advocated during our campaign last year.

As some of you might have read recently in the Collegian, Senate voted on and approved a resolution that recommended to City Commission that smoking be banned in bars. As a bartender and all-too-frequent patron of Aggieville bars, I am against banning smoking from bars and believe the individual bar owner's policy on smoking should be up to the individual bar owner. As student body president, I would favor putting this and other issues up to the minds of all student in a student referendum. We would like to put the power at K-State back where it belongs — with the students.

From talking to many of you since the time we announced our candidacy, something has become very clear. Students have little faith in SGA. Several students told me they would give us their votes if we merely did half of what we said we were going to do. Rest assured, fellow Wildcats, we do intend to carry out our issues and we are not the establishment status quo. We are two students, like any others. We stay up late, sleep late and eat late, but we get to work on time, and working for our fellow students is what we want to do.

We are living in a time that demands change, and we are the candidates to institute that change. Rick Wooten and Aaron Shea hope to bring a new era of excellence in aesthetics, athletics and academics. Thank you.

Candidates serious about fun

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Rick Wooten and Aaron Shea are serious in their bid for the student body presidency. At least, as serious they can be.

Since announcing their candidacy Feb. 18, Wooten, senior in broadcasting, and Shea, senior in secondary education, have been working to be serious candidates for president and vice president, respectively, without taking themselves too seriously.

"We don't want to burn ourselves out running this," Shea said.

The pair's 1999 race for the presidency, arguably the most unconventional that year, encouraged them to try again, Wooten said.

"We had a lot of momentum going after last year," he said. "It's like we never stopped campaigning."

When the pair first ran, they proposed plans to remove head basketball coach Tom Asbury and convert the Fiedler Hall construction site into a pond renamed Fiedler Hole.

They also had a campaign picture side by side within Hale Library with Wooten wearing a tuxedo and Shea wearing nothing but a book and a smile. That photo was symbolic, Wooten said, as he represented Hale's renovated exterior and Shea stood for the lack of materials inside.

Last year's campaign might have accentuated fun, but it never was a joke, Wooten said. The two were just as serious then as they are now, he said.

"We don't want people to take it as silly," Shea said. "We want them to take it as 'We're students like you.'"

Chris Born, senior in marketing, met the pair in Phi Kappa Theta fraternity four years ago. It sometimes was tough to take the campaign seriously, he said, but they spice up the race and add humor.

The misconception is that candidates who like to have fun aren't thinking about issues, he said.

"I'd say, were they elected, they could be very serious," he said.

A lot of voters got to see that serious side, Born said, when Wooten and Shea spoke about their issues.

"I thought they presented themselves really well at some of the debates," he said. "People should know they are intelligent."

This year, Wooten and Shea's platform includes new issues like rejection of a citywide smoking ban and tighter spending limits on campaigns for student government, in addition to last year's moves for campus beautification and the removal of Asbury.

Wooten said the Student Senate resolution to support the city in banning smoking in public places was one of the issues that brought him back to the campaign trail. Having already spoken to Student Senate on the issue, Wooten said the city is being led to think that the resolution has the support of most K-State students. If it did, he said, at least one bar would prohibit smoking.

"I want to say we don't recommend this," he said.

"Talking about being healthy when you're in a bar is just silly," Shea said. "You're drinking."

With campaign finance, Shea said lower spending limits would even the playing field and allow a more diverse group of students to run for office.

"I think a lot of people see it as a club you can't get into," Shea said.

On campus beautification, the running mates said they'd like to pursue goals like a fountain and seating area between the K-State Student Union and Seaton Hall they proposed last year. An attractive campus helps recruitment, they said.

As for the Asbury issue, Wooten and Shea said Asbury's performance is help enough for their campaign.

Election spending tops platform

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Only one of the nine student body presidential tickets is addressing campaign spending limits in its campaign, but the issue remains in every candidate's pockets.

Of their four platform issues, the Rick Wooten/Aaron Shea campaign is pushing for stronger restrictions on how much presidential candidates can spend.

"I think it would bring the focus more to the issues than to T-shirts and buttons," Wooten said.

Under the current regulations, the campaign maximum is $3,000. Presidential candidates can contribute a total of $815 of their own money to their campaign. The rest must come in no more than $15 dollar increments from K-State students, faculty or staff. The purchase of campaign T-shirts is considered a campaign contribution.

Campaign finance is not a new issue for the K-State Student Government Association. In the 1997 elections, several candidates violated what was an $815 limit on items such as T-shirts. Most of the confusion was attributed to the fact that, the year before, items such as T-shirts didn't count toward the spending limit. Last year and this year, T-shirts count toward that spending limit. Student Senate had to amend the regulations to allow all five candidates to continue.

In late 1998, a bill was proposed to raise the spending limit to $2,000. However, T-shirts would have been considered an expense. It also stipulated that candidates only could contribute $1,000 together personally and must receive the rest from contributors. The maximum contribution was proposed at $50 per person.

Student Senate passed the bill, but it was vetoed by then-president Tracey Mann. He said he vetoed the spending limits bill because it did not allow enough spending for campaigns and the possibility of loopholes. Mann returned to Senate with suggestions after the veto. It was amended with some of Mann's suggestions and passed and is in use for this election.

Wooten said he and his running mate would like to see a maximum set at $500. Even without donations, Shea said the $815 personal spending limit gives more affluent students an advantage.

If elected, Shea said the best way to handle the issue would be to lobby. Bringing the issue before Student Senate, the elections committee and the Senate's faculty adviser(s) would be the route, he said.

Student body president candidate Justin Gunter said he agreed that the $3,000 limit seems high and even difficult to spend in such a short campaign.

"It's a huge issue," he said. "I think just to keep it in fairness, it should be lowered a bit. Probably $1,000 would do the trick. I think that would equal it out a bit."

As far as his own campaign, Gunter said the necessities are sidewalk chalk and T-shirts.

"It's a big thing getting your name out," he said.

On the other hand, Gunter said a lower ceiling on spending wouldn't cripple a campaign. In fact, it would mean candidates needed to show the resourcefulness they would need in office anyway.

"I think it would force people to be a lot more creative," he said.

Gunter said he would be interested in changing the regulations if he were elected.

On the other hand, presidential candidate Jesse McCurry said he sees little point in setting a spending limit. With so many restrictions already on when, where and how to campaign, budget is overestimated as a factor, McCurry said.

"There are only so many trees on campus you can put signs on, so many bodies you can put T-shirts on," he said. "You hear people say 'You can just buy the election.' I just don't understand that."

If he had to go to either extreme, McCurry said he'd sooner support no limits at all than restrictions.

"I don't think it's reasonable to say people can't spend any money in a race, so it's the lesser of two evils," he said.

Besides, he said, a good campaign still requires more than money, and people without much money can still stand out.

"I think it's about the candidates themselves. I don't think it makes them any less competitive because you still have to sell yourself to the people," McCurry said.

The K-State graduating class went out with a bang as part of senior night Wednesday.

"Having an opportunity for our three seniors, who have played significant minutes this year, to be able to play most of the ballgame, and for Jenny (Coalson) to be able to come in for two minutes and take the floor again — it almost seems inappropriate to even talk about it."

K-State (13-16, 6-10) defeated Colorado (9-18, 4-12) 64-47 in a contest that saw all four of the women's basketball team seniors contribute.

The Cats received strong performances from senior Angie Finkes, who scored 22 points, and Olga Firsova, who recorded her 100th career block and notched 12 points.

Firsova said she has enjoyed her time at K-State and the art of blocking shots.

"It feels good to block all of those shots," Firsova said. "I bet those people that I block shots on don't feel so good."

K-State also received quality minutes from forward Nicky Ramage, who scored eight points.

She said records like Firsova's don't occur often.

"It's a huge accomplishment for one person to block that many shots," Ramage said. "It is something that is a once in a lifetime thing, and Olga deserves it."

Against the Buffaloes, K-State jumped out to a quick start behind the shooting of guard Kim Woodlee, who had two three-pointers in the game's first 4 1/2 minutes of play. She finished the game with 12 points.

The Cats also were receiving strong play from Finkes, who already had eight points and four rebounds entering the 11:48 mark. At about the 11:40 mark, the Cats' basket seemed to close, as the Cats went ice cold from the floor.

Colorado proceeded to go on a 9-0 run and tie the game at 23.

With the game evened up, the two teams continued to trade punches until Firsova landed a couple of her own punches. She blocked two shots, and the Cats' defense preceded to shut down Colorado.

As a result, the Cats would go on a 10-2 run as the half ended, and at halftime they led 38-30, despite shooting 38 percent from the field.

Finkes' performance at times was dominant in the first half, and she said she wanted to end her home career strong.

"I think tonight, mentally, I wanted to come out and give it all that I have, whether I scored 22 points or 2 points," Finkes said.

In the second half, Firsova continued to take over on the offensive end by scoring three straight field goals.

K-State continued to hammer the ball inside, and the Buffaloes were unable to get anything going offensively.

As a team, Colorado shot just 27 percent from the field. Sabrina Scott led the Buffaloes with 16 points in the contest.

Patterson commends seniors for final home game effort

The night couldn't have been more perfect for the K-State women's basketball team.

When the four Wildcat seniors exited the game with 0:49.2 left, they had played their final game at Bramlage Coliseum.

And they made the most of it in the Wildcats' 64-47 victory over Colorado.

"I don't even have the words for how I feel about Angie (Finkes), Nicky (Ramage), Jenny (Coalson) and Olga (Firsova)," head coach Deb Patterson said. "They have meant so much to this program, this coaching staff and this university."

"It almost seems inappropriate to talk about this game because it feels so good for those young ladies to have the night they just had. I am very happy for them and very proud of them, and I think it was a very fitting final game for each and every one of them here in Bramlage."

Finkes led the senior charge with a game-high 22 points and 10 rebounds.

"I think tonight, my mentality was to come out on the floor and give it all I've got, regardless of what happens, whether I made 22 points or two points," Finkes said.

"I just wanted to lay it all out there on the line for the last time in Bramlage."

Firsova also had a double-double for K-State, scoring 12 points and grabbing 12 boards in the game, marking the first time two K-State players had recorded double-doubles since the season opener against Drake.

The 6-foot-6-inch Firsova also had two blocks on the Buffaloes, giving her 100 in her two-year career at K-State. This ranks her fifth all-time in Wildcat history for career blocks by a men or women's basketball player.

"So many times when I'm watching her play, I just marvel at the effect she has on the game defensively," Patterson said. "For her to achieve that 100-block mark in two years is so special."

"You can understand how special it is when you understand that it puts her in a league with some of the best men's players here. That's a hole you just don't replace. It's a great achievement, and it's not one that I expect any female player to break any time soon."

Firsova's feat also ranks her as the first conference player ever to record 100 blocks in just two seasons.

"It's a huge accomplishment," Ramage said. "For someone to come in here like this for two seasons and take over like Olga did, it's a once in a lifetime kind of thing. And Olga deserves it."

Ramage had eight points and nine rebounds in her home finale, nearly recording the Cats' third double-double of the game.

"It's just something that you'll never forget," Ramage said. "Especially tonight, when you've played your last game on Bramlage floor."

K-State's victory over the Buffaloes also marked the return of Coalson into the Cat lineup. With 3:18 left in the game, Coalson entered the contest for the first time since she was injured in K-State's Dec. 18 loss to Wichita State University.

With 1:10 remaining, Coalson hit a jumper to cap an emotional night for the senior class.

"I think it was awesome," Coalson said, with tears of joy streaming down her face.

Her teammates said they were elated to have Coalson back on the floor for their last home game.

"For Jenny to come out there after not playing the whole Big 12 season and make that shot — it was tremendous," Ramage said.

Finkes said the shot was a fitting way for Coalson to finish her career.

"That's Jenny Coalson," Finkes said, "and that's what we've definitely missed this year. It was great to have her back out on the floor."

Patterson said she never can stress enough how much the four seniors meant to the Wildcat program.

"Someday, when we take Kansas State basketball to the Sweet 16 and to the Final Eight, these players are going to be sitting right behind this staff in the most expensive, hard-to-get seats in the house," Patterson said, "because I'll never forget what they've given."

Men's team falls to Baylor in 1-point loss

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WACO, Texas — K-State was a hairbreadth away from a third conference victory when Baylor's Tevis Stukes hit a fall-away three-pointer from the left baseline with 10 seconds left to lift Baylor to a 67-66 victory Wednesday night.

Before claiming the victory, the Bears (13-13, 4-11 Big 12) had to watch K-State's Kelvin Howell shoot two free throws with two seconds left. Howell missed them both but finished with 11 points.

Cortez Groves' jumper gave the Wildcats (9-17, 2-13) a 66-62 advantage with 1:47 left, but K-State missed its final three field goals and turned the ball over twice down the stretch.

Baylor's Jamie Kendrick, who grabbed three rebounds in the last 38 seconds, also made two free throws in that span. He finished with 21 points and 11 rebounds.

Groves finished with 20 points, while teammate Travis Reynolds scored all 10 of his points in the second half and grabbed 13 rebounds.

The Wildcats opened the game with an 8-0 run, which included two Josh Reid three-pointers.

K-State held the lead until eight minutes were left in the first half, when Stukes connected on one of his four treys to shoot Baylor ahead 19-18.

The Cats used a strong inside game to pull ahead 30-20 with less than three minutes remaining and led 32-29 at the half.

3rd baseman's determination leads to praise

By SAM STIERS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The work ethic and attitude athletes display often determine how well they will do when they are called on to step up in clutch situations.

K-State third baseman Josh Cavender's hard work and positive attitude have allowed him to step into the K-State lineup and become one of the Cats' most valuable players.

Cavender is batting .452 this season, since taking over for Travis André, who was injured in the season opener. K-State's hitting coach Robbie Moen said the key to Cavender's success is a result of his work ethic.

"Josh has really been working hard," Moen said. "He's been coming in early and staying late. It's no surprise to me he's doing well. He's one of our hardest workers offensively and it is starting to pay off now."

The past two years, Cavender has played a back-up role for the Cats. He said staying positive allowed him to be patient and wait for his chance to play.

"Last year, things didn't go my way. I got myself into a hitting slump and never got out of it," Cavender said. "This year I've been more patient at the plate. Coach Moen worked hard with me in the off-season. I'm just hoping to carry my success over for the rest of the season."

K-State head coach Mike Clark said many players who don't see much playing time their first two years would have quit, but Cavender has continued to work hard and now is an asset to the team.

■ See CAVENDER on PAGE 7

"A lot of young men don't have the positive attitude to stay with it. When his opportunity came, he's jumped all over it, and he's been maybe our most valuable player this season, because of the effort he's given us," Clark said.

Cavender's only negative stat so far this season is his eight fielding errors, but he said he doesn't see his defense as a weakness.

"I take pride in my defense, and that's the thing getting to me the most," Cavender said. "I'm trying to stay as positive as I can, and I've been working extra hard in practice."

Clark said he isn't worried about Cavender's fielding and just wants him to continue to be confident.

"Defensively, he's still got some things to work on, but he is a hard worker and he'll iron those things out."

Cavender graduated from Bishop Carroll High School in Wichita and said he came to K-State because of the coaching.

"I really liked coach Clark and the things he brought to the table at this program," he said.

Cavender has hit one home run this year, but Moen said Cavender is a gap hitter whose short game is his best asset.

"He handles the bat well, he can bunt, he's a good drag bunter, he does the little things well," Moen said. "If he stays within his strengths, there's no reason he cannot hit for a high average."

The future looks good for Cavender at K-State. André is back playing for the Cats, but Cavender has for now retained the starting position.

"As long as he stays positive and keeps playing like he's been playing, he's going to have a big role this year on this ball club," Clark said. "He's already had a big impact, and that should continue. He's been great to coach, and I'm really happy for him that he's responded as he has."

right there."

Finkes said the best way for the team to follow up the performance would be to have a good performance in the Big 12 Conference Tournament.

"Go to the Big 12 and win it. That is how you follow it up," Finkes said. "We go to the Big 12 and play just as hard as we did tonight, hopefully blow through it and surprise some people

Rocker prepares to rejoin Braves; suspension cut in half

By PAUL NEWBERRY
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KISSIMMEE, Fla. — Now comes the hard part for John Rocker — making amends with teammates, fans and society in general.

The Atlanta Braves reliever was cleared for spring training Wednesday when his suspension was cut in half by an independent arbitrator, who ruled that Rocker should sit out the first 14 days of the regular season for offending gays, minorities and foreigners. His $20,000 fine also was cut to $500.

The decision, the first by baseball's new arbitrator Shyam Das, was criticized by commissioner Bud Selig. He said it "completely ignores the sensibilities of those groups of people maligned by Mr. Rocker and disregards the player's position as a role model for children."

On Jan. 31, Selig banned Rocker

from all 45 days of spring training and the first 28 days of the season for his comments in Sports Illustrated. Rocker and the players' association asked the arbitrator to overturn the decision, saying it was out of line with past sanctions.

Rocker planned to be at the Braves' training complex, just south of Orlando, on Thursday for a private meeting with his teammates prior to Atlanta's first exhibition game. He also was scheduled to have a news conference.

"He can issue all the apologies he wants. That's the easy thing to do," Braves pitcher Tom Glavine said. "But we'll see if he means it by how he acts every day after that."

While most in the Braves organization said they are willing to give Rocker a second chance, it's clear he returns on shaky ground. Teammates have grumbled privately that his bombastic, self-centered persona was annoying even before the magazine interview in December.

"He has to be more mature dealing with certain situations and dealing with his teammates," said outfielder Brian Jordan, one of Rocker's most vocal critics. "He's got to learn to control his anger. I think that's a big reason he said what he said."

General manager John Schuerholz, who is notoriously tightlipped about trade talks, conceded there was interest in Rocker from other teams and implied a deal could be made if the reliever continues to threaten clubhouse harmony.

In any trade, the Braves likely would insist on another top-level reliever to replace the 25-year-old left-hander who saved 38 games a year ago — one short of the franchise record.

"We're going to see if John can make the kind of corrections that are expected," Schuerholz said. "This gives us an opportunity to see if he and his teammates can become a cohesive unit again."

Rocker's first order of business likely will be a one-on-one meeting with first baseman Randall Simon, who believes Rocker was speaking about him when he referred to a teammate as a fat monkey.

"I deserve an apology," Simon said. "He made a mistake and I hope he regrets what he did. I hope he's mature enough in his mind to treat people better so we can move on."

Rocker joins a long list of players whose suspensions have been overturned or reduced by arbitrators, a group that includes Willie Aikens, Steve Howe (twice), LaMarr Hoyt, Ferguson Jenkins, Jerry Martin, Pascual Perez, Tony Phillips, Gilberto Reyes and Willie Wilson.

"I think this is good all the way around," reliever Rudy Seanez said.

"As I was watching the ball bounce around, when she shot, I was just like, 'man, ball, you had better go in,'" Finkes said. "For her to take the ball, dribble in and score without having practiced, that's Jenny Coalson

Finkes said the best way for the team to follow up the performance would be to have a good performance in the Big 12 Conference Tournament.

"Go to the Big 12 and win it. That is how you follow it up," Finkes said. "We go to the Big 12 and play just as hard as we did tonight, hopefully blow through it and surprise some people is in jail — told the sheriff that people at the house traded crack cocaine for guns.

The ramshackle house is surrounded by mud-caked trash, and the front yard is cluttered with an empty vodka bottle and a rusting black Camaro. The home has tattered and stained curtains, and fluttering plastic garbage bags are taped over broken windows. No one answered the door Wednesday.

The boy and his brother had been staying for about two weeks with the uncle — their mother's brother — after the mother had been evicted from her home, Busch said.

The uncle, Sirmarcus B. Winfrey, was arrested Tuesday night on an outstanding warrant on charges of receiving stolen property and was to be questioned, police said. A second man, who authorities believe once had the gun used in the shooting, turned himself in Wednesday for questioning.

"It's our understanding from the police investigation that this gun was obtained from a bedroom under some blankets which had been left laying, apparently loaded, in this bedroom," Busch said at a news conference.

Investigators also found a stolen 12-gauge shotgun and drugs in the house, the prosecutor said.

Outside the school Wednesday, mourners created memorials of candles, flowers and cards for Kayla, who died a half-hour after she was shot once in the chest. Classes were canceled for the day, but counselors were on hand for anyone who needed them.

Sheila Alger and her 4-year-old son, Austin, placed a teddy bear at the school's front door. "He doesn't understand, and I don't think other kids do," Alger said. "I don't think the boy who did it understands."

Police said they had gotten conflicting stories from the young witnesses about exactly what happened inside Room 6. Some said the boy pointed the gun at others first; others said he didn't. Some reported that he said something to Kayla first; others said he said nothing.

"The witnesses are little kids," King said.

Busch said the school had no metal detectors but had private security guards.

The boy's father served two years in prison on a burglary conviction and now is serving time in the county jail for an alleged parole violation. He told the sheriff that his son had been suspended from school for fighting and for stabbing a girl with a pencil.

The 29-year-old father heard about Tuesday's shooting from a cellmate and a cold, sinking feeling came over him because he knew it was his son, Sheriff Robert J. Pickell said. "He said (his son) liked to watch the violent movies, the television shows."

The sheriff said the father told him that when he asked his son why he fought with other children, the boy told him that he hated them.

And Pickell said that although the father told him he'd never seen the .32-caliber weapon the boy used, people in the house would trade crack for weapons or any kind of merchandise.

"There were people coming and going from this house," Busch said. When police went there, "there were several people just hanging out. I call it a flophouse."

The boy and his brother were placed with relatives, and police have said the boy will be placed in state custody. Police would not disclose the mother's whereabouts.

CHANGE

I really don't think that's answer, because that's not putting multicultural people where it counts," she said.

"That's in Senate, where your voice is heard, and you can vote," Hall said she appreciates that the candidates are taking an interest in the issue.

"The best idea would be the specialty seats, but I understand you have to start somewhere," she said.

Minority representation wasn't Schroeder's only concern, however, when he spoke to Senate in January. He said he also is concerned about the high percentage of greek students in Senate.

While greeks make up 20 percent of the student population at K-State, they make up 55 percent of Senate, he said.

Jared Teach, student body presidential candidate, said that's not going to cut it.

"Greeks obviously call the shots around here," Teach said.

"We're only 20 percent of the population, and that's somewhat inadequate representation for independents."

Rick Wooten, student body presidential candidate, said he knows first hand that might be a problem. He said when he went to visit Senate, he saw a lot of people he knew who were greek.

"It just seemed like too many people I knew from the greek system," he said.

He said some people are upset that they aren't able to participate in Senate.

"When I took one class, I had this woman who was a non-traditional student," he said.

"She was upset that she might not have the chance to be in Senate."

But he said knowing people is the key to getting elected.

"I just think a lot of people aren't voting on particular issues. They're voting on people they know."

Clayes said that's the nature of elections, though.

"It happens on the national level as well," he said. "People from the home state of Arizona, they're going to vote for (Sen. John) McCain. You believe that person represents you better because you have access to that person."

Chris Brooks, student body presidential candidate, said the greek system is kind of like a political party. Although he isn't greek, his running mate, Andrew Miller, is.

"It seems like the greeks do get out and support who's running," Brooks said.

He said if he was elected, he would examine the issue, but he doesn't see a need to change the system.

He said if independents really were concerned about the process, they should support other independents.

"Greeks are going to support greeks and that's just the way it is," he said.

"And there's nothing wrong with that."

ELECTION

Friday when candidates have to turn in their expenditure reports.

As far as the campaigning process, Morgan said everything is going great.

He said there has been only one campaign violation, which was very minor and taken care of quickly.

"I'm very impressed with the way people have been handling things," Morgan said.

However, Morgan said he expects next week to get a little crazier.

One thing Morgan is disappointed about is the census that K-State is requiring students to fill out in order to be able to vote. He said he's afraid it will deter some students from voting. Morgan said he encourages students to take the few minutes to fill the census survey out and vote.

But, other than that everything is fine, Morgan said.

"All is quiet on the election front," he said.

Leota Stockwell plays an old piano at Calico Inn in Riley, Kan., on Tuesday night. Calico Inn used to offer piano entertainment during many of its business hours, but Trix Fasse, owner, said players are hard to find today.

Calico Cravings

Riley, Kan., inn provides colorful atmosphere with down-home cooking

The bench outside was empty, except for the company of the two concrete pigs that were sitting beside it.

A cold breeze blew through the town, making the green garland on the roof shiver and the lights sputter.

Inside, however, it still was Christmas — the Calico Inn in Riley, Kan., still was living up to its decorations and warm family atmosphere.

Trix Fasse, the restaurant's part-owner, thought up the name 23 years ago.

"I thought of it in bed one night," she said. "It sounded like an easy way to decorate because I like antique things."

The first thing that hits people when they walk into the country restaurant is the color — there are red tablecloths, red wooden chairs, red paisley wallpaper, red doors and red light bulbs by the old piano. There also are red Santas everywhere — by the door, by the kitchen, on top of the piano and next to the tables. Even Trix is wearing red, sporting a huge red satin bow on top of her coiffed gray hair.

"I love Christmas. I haven't even put some of the decorations away yet," she said. "And I love red. It's a bright cheery color for me."

Her passions, combined with her interest of antique collectibles, is what gives the restaurant its unique flavor.

"I'm kind of junky," Trix said. "If I like it, I keep it."

Among the accumulation of "junk," as she calls it, is the heavy wooden door from England leading into the restaurant. There also are countless gnome, pig and chicken decorations.

However, Calico Inn wasn't always there. It was used as a newspaper office in the 1890s and then became a family's residence for 25 years. The lady who owned it was going to a nursing home, so she decided to give Trix a call to see if she wanted any of her possessions for her antique shop.

Trix's sister, however, was interested in buying the house and turning it into a restaurant.

"I then went home and thought about it," Trix said. "I wanted it to be an old country restaurant with good food and plenty of it."

Calico Inn opened Dec. 24, 1977, and has been in business ever since.

Not much has changed since 1977, Trix said, except for the wallpaper that had to be changed after a fire consumed it 16 years ago. The menus are different, too. People started to take the hand-painted wooden ones, so Trix said she opted for newspaper-style menus.

"You might say that if I didn't give people enough to eat that I would close," she said.

The restaurant has two big tables and three small ones, so customers have to share space and conversation. There only is seating room for 20 to 25 customers.

This kind of atmosphere is customer Glenda Downing's favorite part.

"You've got to rub elbows with people," she said. "You can't ignore them."

Downing went to Calico Inn to eat dinner Tuesday night with her mother, Leota Stockwell.

But before sitting down to dinner, Trix convinced Stockwell to play a couple of songs on an old piano tucked against a wall.

"I like the whole concept of the place, and the other attraction is Trix," Stockwell said.

Trix also is the reason Amber Pfaff waitresses at the Calico Inn. She has been working there for three years and said her most memorable moments have come when she and Trix joke around in the kitchen.

"I started out doing dishes and Trix made me waitress. She told the cook, 'I'm wearing her down,'" Pfaff said.

There also are two main cooks and a couple of busboys and dishwashers. Trix is a waitress on the weekends, when the restaurant has ribs and fried chicken as specialties.

Interacting with customers is the best part of the job, Trix said. With the restaurant being so small, it is hard not to interact with others.

"There are very few people who don't want to sit with other people," she said. "If you're hungry enough, you'll sit anywhere."

Country Kitchen franchise opens in mall parking lot

By REED DUNN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

They found what they thought was a great location about a year ago.

Ann Carlson, director of marketing, said Restaurant Concepts Inc. decided the parking lot of Manhattan Town Center was the best location to open a Country Kitchen.

"This is a great location," Carlson said. "It's always good to go in a restaurant area where the traffic count is good."

Carlson said Manhattan's previous Country Kitchen was owned by private individuals who were overseen by Restaurant Concepts Inc. She said the individuals wanted out of the business, and the company has been looking to relocate since they closed about three years ago.

"We felt their standards weren't quite up to what we wanted," Carlson said. "We were looking for a good piece of property, and this is it."

Christina Geiger, Country Kitchen waitress, said she thinks the restaurant will be successful in Manhattan. She said there are many items on the menu for a variety of individuals.

"I think it's going to be popular," Geiger said. "I think there's a wide variety of food for students, senior citizens and even people from the military."

Jon M. Robinson, manager, said even though the business just opened Wednesday, he thinks the customers have been impressed.

"It's been great," Robinson said. "We've had a great response so far. We had a soft opening and the response has been great."

Bringing a Country Kitchen, back to Manhattan was something that just seemed to make sense, Carlson said. She said the company is looking forward to serving Manhattan as well as the college population.

"We are excited to be in a college town," she said. "It's progressive because of the college, but it has a great established base."

Country Kitchen opens at 6 a.m. each Tuesday and stays open 24 hours a day until Saturday night. On Sundays and Mondays, business hours are from 6 a.m. to 10 p.m. Carlson said she expects college students will use the dining area for studying because of the long business hours.

She said the restaurant welcomes college students.

"Come on in," Carlson said. "Have a pot of coffee and bring your psych books."

As far as the employee base, Carlson said she is excited about the restaurant's staff.

"I would say we have at least 65 percent student employees, but we also have a number of moms and grandmas," Carlson said. "We have a hometown general manager, and I am really excited about that."

Kevin Peirce, general manager, said the restaurant is different from other establishments of its kind due to the buffet schedule.

"The buffet is definitely a nice feature we have," Peirce said. "We're going to run a breakfast and lunch buffet."

Peirce said there also will be a Night Owl Buffet from 11 p.m. to 3 a.m. Thursdays through Saturdays. Along with the regular buffet schedule, he said the restaurant is planning special buffet times for finals week at K-State.

Even though much of the business will come from students, Carlson said she hopes Country Kitchen will be one of the best family dining establishments in the area.

Opinions divided on new parking solution

By JASON BECK

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State has a proposed solution to the parking problem, but opinions are divided as to how to implement it.

Student Body President Jason Heinrich has proposed a shuttle bus system for K-State and is working to push his plan through various committees before implementation.

"It's moving along, but slowly," Heinrich said.

Heinrich's plan, which includes a bus with stops at University Commons Apartments, Chase Manhattan Apartments, Bramlage Coliseum and the K-State Student Union, is in the Transportation Subcommittee.

Heinrich said he hopes the plan can be implemented by next fall.

Heinrich's plan is a result of two years of research. Since 1998, TransSystems, a Kansas City, Mo., consulting firm, has been looking into the transportation issue both for Manhattan and a separate study for K-State.

TransSystems was hired to study city and campus transportation needs and to make recommendations for public transportation. TransSystems made several proposals, ranging from a shuttle bus system to a permanent parking garage to doing nothing at all.

Heinrich said they chose to go with a shuttle system because it provides a more immediate solution to the parking problem.

"If anything is going to be done," he said, "it's going to be a shuttle system."

Heinrich favors the plan not only as an immediate solution, but also as the most cost-effective one.

The plan would be paid for by a tiered system, where students pay more or less money depending on where they park. Heinrich said concern over the cost issue emphasizes the difficulties he has had in trying to communicate this plan to the student body.

"It's really important," he said, "and the big obstacle is trying to get people informed."

Heinrich said that lack of accurate information being communicated to the students makes it hard to gauge their response. However, concern over the issue of cost has some candidates for office looking for other answers.

Jeremy Claeys, junior in mass communications and a presidential candidate, supports a shuttle system but said he wonders how fair the plan is to all students.

of a permanent parking garage. Claeys said it was a good permanent fix with low maintenance. He also said he believed it would be easier to get alumni donations for a permanent structure than a shuttle system.

"We'll support an efficient system with a fair distribution of the cost to all students," Claeys said.

He said the only way to afford a shuttle system would be a citywide system.

Heinrich, whose plan would cost about $740,000 in start-up costs and have maintenance and operating costs of about $455,000 per year, said he is working with the city.

However, K-State and the city of Manhattan have different goals in their transportation plans. While K-State's need is HIAWATHA, Kan. — The teen-age son of a Buffalo, N.Y., police officer ran away from home with his father's gun and the family car and wound up being killed in a shootout with Kansas authorities after he killed a deputy sheriff.

Vincent A. Smith, 16, was fatally shot by two Kansas Highway Patrol troopers Wednesday night when he charged out of the woods and fired on them.

The deputy, Todd Widman, 21, had responded to a call of a transient or a runaway walking along the main highway in Hiawatha.

Widman apparently had questioned Smith and then put him in his patrol car, said Lamar Shoemaker, Brown County sheriff. He later radioed for help.

Amy Langley said she saw the officer talking to a young boy from his patrol car. She said when she drove past again about 15 minutes later, the car was up against a tree

McBride to perform at Bramlage

By SARAH BAHARI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Martina McBride concert tickets go on sale at 10 a.m. Saturday.

The concert, which will be at 7:30 p.m. April 13 in Bramlage Coliseum, features country singer McBride with special guest Mark Willis.

Jim Muller, associate director of Bramlage, said McBride, who originally is from Sharon, Kan., will be popular with Manhattan residents because she encompasses a wide audience.

"She's a real up-and-comer with real appeal," he said. "She's won some recent things and she holds a broader appeal than many artists."

Bramlage worked with Police Productions, in St. Louis, to bring McBride to Manhattan, he said.

Charlie Thomas, director of Bramlage, said arranging the concert and working with promoters has been a difficult process, but the concert will be well worth the efforts.

"The concert business everywhere has gone flat," he said. "It's a very small market. We're hoping these will be the right baby steps to get back into the market."

Last semester, Bramlage brought country artist Kenny Chesney to Manhattan. That was Bramlage's first concert since Garth Brooks in 1996.

Muller said they expect to sell between 1,000 and 3,000 tickets Saturday. There are 7,500 seats available for the show.

Freshmen train for Chicago marathon with daily workouts

Two K-State freshmen are running away from laziness.

Tasha Naegele and Elizabeth Steranko, both freshmen in open-option, will be participating in the Lake County Marathon on April 30 in Highland Park, Ill.

The 26.2-mile race, which takes place in a northern suburb of Chicago, usually has 500 to 600 participants.

"I've always wanted to do one. Once I heard what a marathon was, I wanted to do one," Naegele said. "It has been a lifelong goal."

Both of the athletes began their running careers in high school cross country. When Naegele and Steranko came to K-State, they both missed running on a regular basis.

Naegele and Steranko both live on the eighth floor of Moore Hall, which is where they met. In November they began running together for exercise, and before Thanksgiving, the duo decided they were going to enter a marathon.

After researching on the Internet, the two runners decided to look for a race in the Midwest that would be around 24 weeks away, which would give them time to properly train. They decided to go with the marathon in Chicago.

"We thought, 'why not Chicago?'" It sounded a lot better than Nebraska," Steranko said.

Naegele and Steranko started a training schedule in mid-November. To train, the duo runs one long run, two medium runs, one short run and a day of cross training each week. As the time for the marathon nears, the length of their runs increases.

The daily long distance running has taken the two around Manhattan and has worn on them.

"Sometimes you're so achy you just can't sleep," Naegele said.

Naegele and Steranko have been supported well by those around them. Even though they were hesitant at first, both runners have supportive parents.

Other students in Moore Hall support them too. "I don't think anybody believed us at first," Steranko said. "But we've had people talk to us about going. I don't know how serious they are, but it would be a fun road-trip."

Naegele and Steranko are nervous about the trip but said they plan to use that to their advantage.

"The adrenaline and nervousness during the race will help us through," Steranko said.

Cattlemen's Day celebration at Brandeberry Sports Complex

By JENN DAVOREN AND MAGGIE
MARTIN

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's strong commitment to agricultural studies is just one reason for today's 87th Annual Cattlemen's Day, said Dan Moser, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry.

Cattlemen's Day, sponsored by the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry, invites anyone involved with or interested in the cattle industry to Brandeberry Sports Complex for a day of beef-production discussion to begin at 8 a.m.

"There are several events that we think can benefit cattle producers," Moser said. "We also encourage our undergraduate students or anyone else to sit in on the sessions."

The day will feature many events centered around the beef industry, including an update on K-State beef research at 10 a.m. to be moderated by Moser.

"I'll be moderating on research project results so far and how we think it can affect the cattle industry," Moser said.

Lyle Gray, chairman of Cattlemen's Beef

Promotion and Research Board, will be available during a panel discussion of industry issues. The discussion is just one of the day's events that will stretch until 4:30 p.m.

"There are sessions on a variety of topics, from scientific management topics to personal management issues," Moser said. "We have all kinds of things that hopefully help some producers that have questions."

Cattlemen's Day events will culminate with a bull and heifer sale at 4:30 p.m. in Weber Arena.

In addition to Cattlemen's Day, the K-State Collegiate Cattlewomen hope to promote the beef industry by giving the Manhattan community, faculty, students and greeters a chance to show off their cooking skills.

The club is sponsoring the 2nd annual Beef Cook Off at 4:30 p.m. Saturday in Weber 111. The deadline for entries has been extended to 6 p.m. today.

Rules and information are available outside of Weber 126.

"We are trying to make people more aware of the beef industry," said Jenna

Police think shooting spree suspect racially motivated

WILKINSBURG, Pa. — A black man accused of killing two people and wounding three in a shooting rampage had anti-white writings in his apartment and singled out whites during the attack, reassuring a black woman in his path, "Not you, sister," authorities and witnesses say.

"The general tenor was that he was not shooting anybody but whites," Allegheny County homicide Lt. John Brennan said Thursday as authorities tried to put together a portrait of Ronald Taylor.

On Wednesday, the 39-year-old jobless man allegedly shot a maintenance worker at his apartment building and four other people at two fast-food restaurants in working-class Wilksburg. All five victims were white men.

Brennan said that when police searched Taylor's home Wednesday night, they found anti-white writings. He refused to release the contents.

"They were just some of his thoughts," Brennan said. "It was basically anti-white, anti-Jew."

Police planned to bring hate-crime charges against Taylor in addition to the two counts of criminal homicide he already faces. The FBI also was opening a civil rights investigation.

Still, investigators said it was unclear whether his main motivation was racial.

"Obviously, we're still getting a lot of information from witnesses about comments he made and things about shooting white people," Wilksburg Police Chief Gerald Brewer said. "There's a lot of anger and hostility in this individual, so I think it's a little premature to simply define this as a racist event."

Taylor's lawyer, James Ecker, said he has no reason to believe his client harbors any hostility toward whites. "I'm a white lawyer," he said.

Police said Taylor, angry at how long it took to have a broken door at his fifth-floor apartment fixed, set the apartment on fire and shot and killed John Kroll, a 55-year-old maintenance worker. He then walked to a nearby Burger King, where he shot Joseph Healy, a 71-year-old former Roman Catholic priest, police said. Healy later died.

Taylor then crossed the street to a McDonald's, where three other people — all white men — were shot, police said. All three remained in critical condition Thursday. One was described as brain-dead.

Taylor surrendered to police about two hours after he holed up in an office building and took four or five people in wheelchairs hostage, police said.

Joyce Ambrose, who briefly was kept hostage in the building, said the gunman told another black woman, "Not you, sister," as he threatened to shoot others.

Police said they heard reports that Taylor had told other blacks he did not intend to hurt them.

Monique Frost, a mental health therapist whose mother and grandmother live in the apartment across the hall from Taylor, disputed any racial theory.

"I know he made some racial statements, but he set that fire in a building where all African-Americans live, with the exception of one Caucasian," Frost said. "And he didn't warn anybody. The people in that building could have died."

However, his landlord, Rebecca Vankirk, told KDKA-TV on Wednesday that Taylor doesn't like any whites and had argued with her before.

US penitentiary employees suspects in beating case

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — Three employees from the U.S. Penitentiary in Leavenworth have been indicted in the beating of two inmates, U.S. Attorney Jackie Williams said Thursday.

Stewart Venable, 37, and Willie Mack, 36, both of Leavenworth, and Gordon E. Cummings, 47, of Tonganoxie, were charged with civil rights violations in an indictment returned Thursday by a federal grand jury.

The three are accused of assaulting and injuring inmate Tyrone Long on March 28, 1997.

Venable and Mack also were indicted on a criminal civil rights violation against inmate Kristen Maples, who was assaulted the same day.

Venable was a supervisor at UNICOR, a prison factory operated at the Leavenworth compound. Mack Cummings were correctional officer

Advisers, safety issues tackled at debate

■ Lobbying Legislature, financial aid discussed at UPC-sponsored event.

By DANEDRI THOMPSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student body presidential candidates and their running mates debated ideas for bettering advising, campus security and lobbying the Kansas Legislature on Thursday afternoon in the Union Courtyard.

Steve Hall, presidential candidate, said advising is one of the most important issues on his platform. He said a list of adviser responsibilities needs to be published, and compliance with the list should be included when professors are evaluated by deans for raises or tenure.

"Advisers need to be held accountable for the advice they give," he said.

Dana Pracht, vice presidential candidate running with Jake Worcester, said she agreed.

"Currently, they are only held accountable for their teaching and research," she said.

Jesse McCurry, presidential candidate, said he agreed that bad advisers need to be kept accountable, but good advisers need to be rewarded too.

"Let good advisers advise more students if they want to," he said.

Matt Kelso, vice presidential candidate running with Justin Gunter, said while advising could be improved, part of the responsibility for good advising should fall to students.

"Everybody out here is hopeful in college," he said. "You've got to take responsibility for yourself. You can't just go in once a semester and expect the adviser to solve all your problems."

SGA ELECTIONS
2000

Presidential candidate Jeremy Claeys said it's a university problem, however, and that there are only four advisers for open-option students.

"We need to increase that," he said. "There are thousands of people in open-option, and these are people who need guidance. We need to provide it for them."

The candidates also discussed campus safety.

Ali Karimi, vice presidential candidate running with Drew Maenche, said K-State is pretty safe.

"Coming from Baltimore, this place looks like Candyland to me," he said.

Stan Burkin, vice presidential candidate running with Jared Teach, said campus safety is a primary concern in his campaign.

He agreed K-State is fairly safe, but could improve crosswalk lighting.

"We're trying to get lights there so people know when others are crossing," he said.

Gunter said he and Kelso also would like to see more lights.

"We'd like to see more lights on Claflin and Denison, but it has to be cost effective," he said.

Rick Wooten, presidential candidate, said cost is important to him, too.

"We are for any safety measures that are cost effective," he said.

Ryan Hoskinson, vice presidential candidate for Hall, said while campus safety is an ongoing concern, Student Governing Association should be commended for its work on safety issues.

"They've been working on this from the get-go," he said.

Kylo Heller, vice presidential candidate running with McCurry, said adding more lights isn't the issue, but educating students is. He said most K-State students are from small communities and might not know how to take safety precautions on a college campus.

"I think students need to be more informed," he said. "They need to be told at freshman orientation."

Candidates also debated new ways to lobby student concerns to the Legislature and the Kansas Board of Regents. The importance of low tuition is something candidates said they would stress to both groups.

Claeys said that, if elected, he and Metzinger would like to install a three-year tuition freeze. He said the last time there was a tuition freeze, tuition jumped 22 percent when it ended, but he said that wouldn't happen again.

"It happened because students weren't there to say, 'The students are no longer your scapegoat,'" he said.

Worcester said keeping costs low is important, but freezing tuition could hurt the school in the long run.

"If we get a tuition freeze, that's great for me," he said. "But when it's over, my sister is still going to be here."

For that reason, presidential candidate Teach said he would like to slow down tuition, but not freeze it.

"We would talk more to them about financial aid staying parallel to the rise of tuition," he said.

Wooten said K-State is a great educational value. If we have to pay a little bit more for it, it's worth it, he said.

One thing that he said wasn't worth the money, however, was purchasing stickers, posters or T-shirts for campaigning.

In his closing statement, Wooten said he decided against spending any money on his campaign.

"We took the money we were going to spend for stickers and cut a check to the Women's Crisis Center," he said.

Privilege Fee Committee considers funding UCS

By GINA KOHAKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Student Senate Privilege Fee Committee will propose a plan to Senate that will fund University Counseling Services, part of Lafene Health Center, over the next three years.

The bill outlines a budget for the University Counseling Services that includes a base allotment of $453,931 plus 3.35 percent to cover salary increases, a variable benefits package and longevity for employees of the center.

The committee approved the bill with a vote of 9-0.

The motion, brought forward by Ted Conrad, vice chair of the committee, will provide University Counseling Services with privilege fees amounting to $482,138 in 2001, $497,384 in 2002 and $513,611 in 2003 if approved by Senate.

Director Fred Newton said the center is suffering from a spending deficit due to unpredicted salary increases by the state in previous years, which surpassed the actual budgets.

"The 3.35 percent is basically what we figured to be a 2.5-percent salary increase and then the variable benefits package, which means every staff member will have a little different benefits depending on how much they are making or if they are classified or unclassified."

Classified employees are generally K-State faculty, while unclassified employees are university staff.

Also included in the bill is an increase in operating fees to support replacing computers and the cost of phones, Newton said.

"We want to be able to maintain where we are at," Newton said, "no longer carrying into the budget of the next year."

University Counseling Services also is exploring other options to strengthen its budget for the future.

Newton said more contracts with outside sources are a possible option.

"Right now, we have a contract with Salina to do service for them, which puts money back into the budget," Newton said.

Another consideration for the center is to start charging patients according to the number of visits.

"We can get additional funding by raising the fee. I would rather do it incrementally, though," Newton said. "That would help considerably over the next three years."

Palm stock rises 150 percent

By CLIFF EDWARDS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SANTA CLARA, Calif. — The stock price of Palm Inc., the 3Com Corp. subsidiary that makes the popular Palm electronic organizers, rose nearly 150 percent Thursday on its first day of trading.

Palm said Wednesday it raised $874 million selling selected investors shares at $38 apiece. On Thursday, shares opened at $145 on the Nasdaq Stock Market and closed at $94.50.

Palm's devices perform functions including scheduling, keeping phone numbers and recognizing handwriting.

Palm has 75 percent of the market in handheld electronic organizers, and more than 90 percent of the handheld organizers sold in the United States in the fourth quarter of 1999 use the Palm operating system, according to PC Data, a Reston, Va.-based market research firm.

Even more important, Palm — unlike many other companies with recent initial public offerings — is making money, with $23 million in profits on $435 million in sales in the six months ended Nov. 26.

3Com, which will initially retain ownership of 94.8 percent of Palm, plans to spin it off to shareholders later this year. The share price of 3Com, the No. 2 maker of computer networking equipment behind Cisco Systems, has more than doubled in the past month.

3Com also sold Palm shares directly to corporate partners America Online, Nokia and Motorola, raising an additional $277 million.

The Palm IPO is intended to help fund its new strategy of licensing its operating system and letting other manufacturers build the devices.

Collegian to endorse presidential candidate

The Collegian Editorial Board wants its readers to make informed voting decisions.

To further that cause, the board has chosen to endorse one of the presidential tickets.

That ticket will be announced in Monday's editorial.

The board did not arrive lightly at its decision to endorse a candidate.

Because the Collegian is the sole source of campus information for many readers, all members of the board took into account the potential effects such a stance could have.

However, any perceived downside was agreed to be outweighed by the potential benefits of taking a stance.

With about 20,000 students on campus, it is unrealistic to expect each candidate to meet each student individually.

Therefore, it is impossible for every student to ask those candidates questions about their campaigns and campus issues or to get a grasp on their personalities.

The board decided it was not only a good idea, but its obligation, to endorse a candidate.

The goal of any newspaper is to inform its readers. In this case, simple news stories, issue stories and guest viewpoints did not seem to be enough.

Instead, the board realized personal interviews with each candidate were necessary to ensure readers receive all available information.

So the board has taken its decision quite seriously.

Personal interviews, platform ideas and guest columns all will be weighed in the final decision, which will be published Monday.

Remember to take this with a grain of salt. Each member of the editorial board is a human — one with his or her own personality, beliefs, biases and ideas.

Because of this, their opinions might not reflect what you think. But it will be the best job the board could do of evaluating the entire collection of candidates.

It will be exactly what it says. It will not be your view.

It will be "Our View."

► OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

The Collegian's Reader Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on any topic for 20 seconds.

Jeff Elliott, will you marry me?

If you're going to ban smoking in all the bars, you might as well ban drinking.

Hey, Asbury, have you ever thought about recruiting from the women's practice squad?

There's too many presidential candidates. Every time you poll them, their answers look like a Supreme Court decision.

I'm glad that when I get kicked out of the library at 11 o'clock I can still go work out for a whole hour.

Has anybody noticed there's a national election going on. Let's hear some opinions about that instead of religion.

Did the bike cop retire already, or did he just get tired of chasing people? I haven't seen him around.

I was just wondering if there was anybody on campus who isn't running for campus president.

Baylor Bears, huh? Way to go, Asbury.

Every team has their bad years. I think this just must be our bad year, and we've got plenty of good years ahead of us. So, keep trying, Cats. We're behind you all the way.

Rain, rain, come today. Wash all this damn chalk away.

Thank God, Kathy Lee Gifford is finally leaving. Now, if we can only do something about Asbury.

This is for all the fair-weather fans at K-State that are griping about the basketball season. It's not like the football team has been recognized in the media forever. Grow up or transfer.

I was just wondering if Asbury is subleasing for the summer. We're looking for a nice place to live.

Let's get off of Roney and the New International Version he rode in on.

Once Asbury's gone, I think we should hire Manny Dies.

fighting with the full-length MIRROR

Clothing cloaks weaknesses of bodies; women in hiding due to societal pressure

The reflection in the mirror startles me. My towel is on the floor, and my wet hair is in desperate need of a comb. Quickly, I try to find clothes to cover my body, to hide my weaknesses. The clothing will act as a comfort zone for what irritates me about myself.

I close my eyes so the reflection doesn't frustrate me even more. Yet the questions still form. Why did I have that banana split? Couldn't I have refrained from hitting the bars constantly since this semester began? Why wasn't I born to be toothpick thin?

Ever since high school, this has been my routine of torture. It is a routine of constant emotional and mental self-abuse. It is a battle of criticizing my body image.

Nearly everyday I go running around my neighborhood. It makes me feel like I am trying to push past what makes me weak and escape who I am, all the while striving for whom one can never be.

Perhaps you have seen me running. My eyes are searching off and thinking of every step. There are no positive thoughts when this occurs. Over and over, like a broken record, I criticize my body and think of what negative comments others have said about my body "jokingly." It is the motivation to go another block, to finish the mile and to keep running when my body feels like it can't.

Some might blame this personal battle on magazines that feature waif-like models. Others might blame it on TV characters or commercials. For some, the blame resides with trying to give men the perfect woman with the perfect body. Yet deep down I know men typically like women whom they don't fear they are hurting when they hug, or touch them.

But these reasons alone are not why more than 2 million cosmetic procedures were performed in the United States in 1997, according to the American Association for Aesthetic Plastic Surgery.

The magazines and TV shows only assist in making people feel inferior. Society helps in making people think their physical beauty should be their best trait. These factors, topped with others, are only a few segments of the problem.

Yet the real blame of low physical self-esteem lies within the individual. It lies within the eyes that close when a full length mirror is around. It is found within the guilt that accompanies eating a medium order of fries vs. a small order. It is the guilt of only running half of a mile instead of a full mile.

The low self-esteem only resides in terms of my physical body. Academically and socially I feel acceptable, that I am worthy of taking up space. Physically, this assurance is not the same.

I am proud of how hard I have worked to drop two sizes since this school year began. The loyalty to eating the right foods and exercising has allowed me to once again wear my favorite pair of jeans from high school. But I feel that I am capable of losing more weight.

Physically, I might be improving, but what about mentally and emotionally? The more weight I lose, the harder I am on myself. This obsession has nothing to do with the male sex, a career objective or anything else. It has to do with my personal feeling of satisfaction and of self-worth.

Does this pursuit of a beautiful body mean that one will become a more beautiful person? If one focuses solely on their outer appearance, do they simultaneously neglect who they are as a person?

There will come a day when I no longer will be able to wear my favorite pair of jeans. The time will come when I will have to head over from the juniors department to the woman's section in the clothing department. I hope when this occurs, I will walk with confidence and accept who I am. And if I catch a glimpse of my reflection, I hope I won't close my eyes in shame or bow my head in discontent.

By then, I hope that I will come full circle with the realization that true beauty has nothing to do with the size of one's physical body.

For now I will keep closing my eyes when there is a full length mirror in sight and foolishly keep mentally destroying who I, being shallow, think is all that I am.

Acquittal in Diallo trial raises questions about justice, fairness

VIEWPOINT

ALICIA GOHEEN

Forty-one bullets ripped through the Bronx night. Nineteen of them cut into the body of Amadou Diallo.

He was a suspect because police thought he matched a generic rapist profile; he was a victim because police thought his wallet was a gun.

On Feb. 25, a jury acquitted the four police officers charged with the murder of Diallo, and parts of New York City were stunned.

The Rev. Al Sharpton was called to New York for federal intervention to deal with the police, as they did in the Rodney King trial.

Diallo's mother, still in disbelief of the verdict and her son's death, said, "Nothing can bring back Amadou, but if his cause can help clarify the situation so that people can live in peace, I think that would be a great honor."

Not everyone feels an injustice has occurred.

Attorneys for the police officers stated the verdict carried out the law in a just manner. The ruling of the jury, they felt, was appropriate.

I still question. How can a verdict that acquits four police officers of shooting more than 41 bullets, 19 of which hit their target, into an unarmed man be justice?

But that isn't the right question to be asking. It is justice no matter what the outcome. Both sides had the opportunity to present evidence to sway the jury in either direction.

What people (myself included) have trouble dealing with is the concept of fairness.

Was it fair that nothing will happen legally to the officers who shot Diallo?

Even the jury felt that the judgment was not ideal. Speaking to the news media, jurors stated that the wording of the law made the actions of the police officers legal, and therefore the decision they made legally correct.

But they also stated that action should be taken ethically or morally where the law failed.

They are mistaken in saying that the law failed, however. The law was upheld. It is our sense of fairness that has fallen apart.

Everyone would agree that sometimes the system fails to carry out fairness. The rapist gets away because of a technicality, or the evidence to convict a drug dealer is inadmissible because it was illegally obtained.

But the important issue remains that justice is carried out. The rights of the accused are protected.

The belief remains that people are innocent until proven guilty.

Even if I believe what happened to Diallo was unfair, I will not trade my feelings for the right to have justice served, and neither should the state of New York.

Candidates Worcester, Pracht promise to 'make it happen' with student body votes Responsible issues. Solid leadership. Diverse experiences. Those are three reasons we're asking for your vote March 6-8.

We're running for student body president and vice president because we know what it takes to "make it happen." In fact, that's our campaign slogan.

Making it happen means more than fulfilling campaign promises. It's about serving students on every level — providing leadership with our campus platform, as well as to the Kansas Board of Regents and Kansas Legislature.

Our campaign centers around three main areas: academic quality, technological advancement and student life.

We believe every student should have a chance to succeed at K-State. That success starts with academic advisers, who help students plan their classes and their future.

Faculty members who advise students should be evaluated on their advising skills — not just their research and teaching. This would give students a voice in the advising process and improve standard advising that hurts students' academic progress.

We also want to continue to expand the KATS system by making some campus services, such as transcript requests, available online. This system should continue to grow and allow students convenient access to their information.

In addition, we will push for K-State to purchase Internet security software that would allow more resources to be available online. Imagine having all of Hale Library's online material at your fingertips at home as you work late to finish a paper or project.

Student life is a key part of the K-State experience, and we want to give campus organizations the tools to help them succeed. We would work toward the construction of a Student Activity Center — an addition to the K-State Student Union with office space for student groups as well as Greek Affairs, multicultural student organizations, Student Governing Association and Union Program Council.

This space would allow groups to plan projects together and share ideas for campus improvement. It also would give all organizations access to office space, meeting rooms and support staff to help them succeed.

We want to improve the Consumer and Tenant Affairs office by providing an off-campus housing guide for students. This guide — both in print and online — would contain detailed information about all available housing and make it easier to find an affordable place to live.

Our issues are realistic. These proposals can be accomplished and they will benefit all students.

But there's more to being president and vice president than campaign issues. We will listen to student concerns and seek your input on issues throughout our term.

We are committed to representing K-State students to the administration and state officials. We will fight unreasonable tuition and fee increases and work to keep quality education accessible to all students.

We have a true desire to serve K-State. With experience in SGA and many other activities, we have the knowledge and ability to affect positive change.

We would appreciate your support March 6-8. Cast your vote for Jake and Dana — candidates who will "make it happen."

Presidential and vice presidential candidates Jake Worcester, senior in agricultural economics, and Dana Pracht, junior in life science and psychology, said their leadership skills will allow them to represent the student body. "We can jump right in and get things done," Worcester said.

Leadership skills help candidates

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jake Worcester said he loves K-State.

Dana Pracht said she loves K-State.

Together, they are combining their leadership and experiences at K-State to make a bid for the student body presidential and vice presidential positions.

Worcester, senior in agriculture economics, said he and Pracht, junior in life science and psychology, have a variety of leadership experiences on campus that enable them to represent the student body well.

"We understand how to get things done on campus," he said. "You have to know how things work in order to get things done. We can jump right in and get things done."

Some of Worcester's activities on campus include Student Senate chair, Blue Key president, Ag Ambassadors and Student Alumni Board.

Pracht's activities include Panhellenic Council vice president, Arts and Sciences Ambassadors and Chimes Junior Honorary.

Worcester and Pracht said they are running on issues that will put students first.

"We truly believe the issues we have will affect all students and can be done," Pracht said.

Worcester and Pracht's first issue is academic quality. They said they want to improve academic advising to make it easier for students to succeed. They also want to push for more faculty positions to decrease the student-to-faculty ratio.

The second issue Worcester and Pracht are focusing on is making improvements in technological advancement at K-State. They want to work on an Internet authentication system that would allow access to online library resources from off-campus and residence hall computers.

They said they also want to expand the services of KATS, including being able to request transcripts through KATS instead of having to go to the Registrar's Office to fill out forms and pay $5.

Another technological improvement Worcester and Pracht would like to see is increased computer lab access and laser printers in campus labs rather than dot matrix printers.

The last area Worcester and Pracht want to focus on is student life.

They said they are interested in adding a Student Activity Center to the K-State Student Union that would house the Student Governing Association, Greek Affairs, multicultural organizations, Union Program Council and other student organizations. They said an activity center would provide interaction between all student organizations rather than separating the groups across campus.

"Our issues aren't designed to get votes; they're designed to get results," Pracht said.

Besides the three areas Worcester and Pracht are concentrating their platform on, they said they will be prepared to deal with other issues like tuition increases, transportation and library funding once in office.

"These issues are the job of the student body president no matter who you are," Worcester said.

Before addressing issues, though, Worcester and Pracht said their main concern is staying in touch with the students.

"That should be the first priority of the student body president and vice president," Pracht said.

Worcester, Pracht support new campus activity center

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An intense, amazing place with a buzz in the air is how Jake Worcester describes student activity centers he's visited at other campuses.

That's why he wants a Student Activity Center at K-State.

Worcester, student body presidential candidate, and Dana Pracht, student body vice president candidate, have proposed an activity center that would be an addition to the K-State Student Union and house all campus organizations, including the Student Governing Association, Multicultural Student Organizations, Greek Affairs and Union Program Council.

"I visited other universities with student activity centers and saw the positives it brought to the campus," Worcester said. "Walking in, I saw students from all different backgrounds and all different organizations working in the same place."

Pracht said they're not looking at the added physical space of a student activity center on campus.

"It's the fact that we're creating an environment where students are interacting with one another," she said.

Besides providing a place for organizations to interact with one another, Worcester said an activity center also would help all students who are interested in campus organizations.

"It gives students one place to go," he said.

Worcester and Pracht are not sure of the cost of building a student activity center, but they said the most it could cost the students is $5 to $7 more in privilege fees.

"It won't be more than that," Worcester said. "If you know me from Student Senate, I fight privilege fees harder than anyone else, but when there's an opportunity that comes along that the benefits outweigh the costs, I'm for it."

SGA ELECTIONS
2000

Any new privilege fee for construction or renovation would have to be approved by 60 percent of the student body in a referendum vote.

"We think when students see the positives it brings, we're not going to have a problem with that vote," Worcester said.

Union Governing Board President Jeremy Lutz said he thinks a student activity center is a great concept.

"I believe this center will benefit the entire campus life, students, faculty and administration," he said. "The advantages outweigh the disadvantages."

Lutz said an activity center is an attainable goal. He said key leaders and administration have visited other universities to study their centers.

"It is my understanding that they, along with other students of KSU, feel this is the next logical step as we move forward," he said.

Office of Student of Activities and Services coordinator Gayle Spencer said the concept of an activity center came about after the programming director position for the Union Program Council came open. She said Union Executive Director Bernard Pitts, Dean of Student Life Pat Bosco and Assistant Dean of Student Life Carla Jones wanted to see what happened if UPC and OSAS answered to one person. A student activity committee was formed to see how this went.

That committee then recommended that the university begin to look at the idea of a student activity center. The Student Activity Center Project Committee, made up of 16 students and seven faculty members, was formed to look at the feasibility of a center, and legislation was passed in Senate to allocate money for Ken Ebert Design Group to do a feasibility study.

"We really went out and looked at what we don't have compared to other universities, and there was clearly a gap," Spencer said. "Almost no one has a place on campus to call home or to put their things."

Spencer said architect Ken Ebert should have a rendering of the center for the committee to look at the end of March, and hopefully, by the end of the semester have an idea of how much it would cost.

Tim Yeaglin, UPC president and member of the committee, said he's in favor of an activity center.

He said UPC competes for the same audience and for the same money of many other campus organizations. An activity center would allow for organizations to come together and discuss what programs would be done and who would be the sponsors, Yeaglin said.

"Higher quality programming could be done," he said.

However, Yeaglin said there still is a lot of work to be done in the planning process.

Worcester said reaching he and Pracht's goal of a student activity center is just a matter of educating students and getting them excited.

"This has been proven to work at other universities," he said. "We're falling behind in student-organization development and this is a way to catch up."

Next year's team representatives announced

By MICHAEL NOLL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State football program has announced next year's leaders.

On Wednesday, player representatives for the 2000 football team were announced by head coach Bill Snyder.

The group includes senior running back David Allen, senior quarterback Jonathan Beasley, senior safety Jarrod Cooper, senior center Randall Cummins, senior wide receiver Quincy Morgan, senior defensive lineman Mario Fatafeh, junior wide receiver Aaron Lockett and senior tight end Shad Meier.

The offensive line will be represented by junior Thomas Barnett and senior Milford Stephenson. Senior defensive ends Chris Johnson and Monty Beisel, senior linebackers Jason Kazar and Turelle Williams and junior linebacker

BEASLEY

Ben Leber will represent the defensive front seven.

Allen, Cummins and Morgan earned first-team All-Big 12 honors in 1999, and Lockett, Cooper and Fatafeh garnered second-team All-Big 12 honors. As a team, the Cats will look to match or improve upon last year's No. 6 ranking and 11-1 record.

COOPER

Snyder said.

"This position of leadership honors those players who have demonstrated to their teammates their desire to achieve common team goals and their willingness to work as hard as they can," Snyder said. "They set the example, give guidance and direction and hold themselves and their teammates accountable for being the best they can be in football, academics and their personal lives."

The position of player representative is one step below that of team captain. If an issue arises in one group of players, the position representative will take it to Snyder to be dealt with.

Captains will be named the night before the annual Purple-White Spring Football Game on April 29. Spring practice begins April 5.

Wildcat baseball team looks to beat Oklahoma

By MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Don't expect to see many home runs for the K-State baseball team during its three game series with Oklahoma.

Actually, don't expect the Wildcats to hit the long ball much at all this season. K-State (3-7, overall, 0-3 Big 12) has cracked just three balls over the fence all season, with each coming from a different player.

This is a team that must score runs the old-fashioned, Ty Cobb way.

"We're going to be a club that's going to have to manufacture runs," K-State hitting coach Robbie Moen said.

"We're going to have to get a lot of hits every game. We're just not going to hit a lot of home runs. We'll have to string together two, three, four hits in an inning."

That's probably just as well for the games against the Sooners. Oklahoma (7-5, 0-0) has given up just seven home runs all season in 12 games and sports a team ERA of 3.43.

Two of the three Sooner starting pitchers K-State likely will face have ERAs under 2.20, not exactly encouraging for a Wildcat team that has pounded out more than 10 hits in a game just once in its past seven tries.

"OU is pitching the ball very well right now," Moen said. "We're going to have some challenges ahead of us this weekend in scoring runs."

K-State enters the series with a team batting average of .287, and Moen said his hitters have made consistent improvement in the early stages of the season from a physical standpoint.

"What we're really working hard on now is the mental side of hitting — how to prepare, how to have a plan of attack against certain pitchers and how to stick to it, what your strengths are, what your weaknesses are and how to work to your strengths and stay away from your weaknesses," Moen said.

With nine of its next 10 games coming against Big 12 Conference foes, K-State will have to amend its hitting problems quickly.

"I think we're up to it, and I think we're capable of doing it," Moen said. "We've just got to be ready mentally."

The first game of the series begins at 3 p.m. today in Norman.

"We're going to be a club that's going to manufacture runs."

Game against Texas marks last in Bramlage for senior K-State players

When K-State battles No. 14 Texas at 7 p.m. Saturday, three seniors will take the floor at Bramlage Coliseum for the final time.

Guards Cortez Groves and Josh Reid and forward Tony Kitt will don the purple and white for the last time on their home court.

"We have three seniors, each of which has been a terrific representative of Kansas State University," K-State assistant coach Mark Fox said. "Certainly, they're three young men who will all leave with degrees and hopefully fond memories of Kansas State."

"I hope that our fans and their fellow students will see them depart and have fond memories of them. They're terrific young people. I hope that they'll have a warm and successful send-off in their last game at Bramlage."

However, the seniors and the rest of the Wildcats (9-17, 2-13) will have to get past the Longhorns (21-7, 12-3), a team that sits one game behind conference-leader Iowa State.

The Horns have won seven of their last eight games, including a 68-54 victory over No. 23 Kansas on Monday in Austin.

"They're playing very, very well, obviously," Fox said. "Certainly they have found a groove in the month of February and are trying to carry that into March."

Texas is led by 7-foot junior center Chris Mihm, who is averaging 18.1 points and 10.5 rebounds per game this season. The Austin native is the Horns' dominant presence in the middle, producing 81 blocks this season.

"He's a terrific player," Fox said. "We'll do a number of things with our defenses. But whatever we do, whether it be to zone him or double team him, he'll be a huge key to the game."

Texas senior Gabe Muoneke has proved to be a force as well, scoring 16 points in the win over the Jayhawks.

The 6-foot-7-inch guard's 13 points per game is complimented by four other Horns averaging more than eight points per contest. Point guard Ivan Wagner (8.7 points per game) set a career-high Monday with 19 points against Kansas.

Meanwhile, the Cats are coming off a heartbreaking 67-66 loss at Baylor on Wednesday.

K-State led by four with 40 seconds remaining, but Bears guard Tevis Stukes hit a clutch three-pointer with 10 seconds left to complete the comeback victory.

Groves scored 20 points in the losing effort.

"We've been playing much better, we've just got to eliminate a few more key mistakes," Fox said. "But when the conference tournament starts, everybody's record is 0-0."

"So, we're going to play this one and see what happens, and then we'll regroup after that."

"I hope that our fans and their fellow students will see them depart and have fond memories of them. They're terrific young people."

Mark Fox, K-State assistant coach

Cat fans should forget season's failures, see senior's last home game

Saturday will not turn out the way it truly should.

In a perfect world, March 4 would be a gathering of many at Bramlage Coliseum to celebrate the careers of Cortez Groves, Tony Kitt and Josh Reid, the three senior basketball players who will make their Little Apple adieu against Texas.

But it won't happen this way. Not in a season riddled with rumors of coaching changes, player dismissals and an 11-game losing streak that pushed K-State fans farther and farther away from the team. A sellout crowd would be wishful thinking, even with one of the Big 12's best teams in town.

The team's "resilient three" deserve better.

Think about more than the contributions made by Groves, Kitt and Reid. Think about the commitment to a struggling program each of these men have made. It's more than any recent senior class can take credit for.

Cortez Groves might be the least-recognized leading scorer to ever play for the Wildcats. Soft-spoken by nature, the community-college transfer guard entered the program prior to the 1998-99 season with modest expectations. A lot has changed since.

The Raytown, Mo., product might not say much on the court, but his play speaks volumes. Groves' 16.1 points per game average is generated primarily by a deadly outside shooting touch. With 65 three-pointers on the year and 103 in his career, Groves already has tied for fifth place on K-State's career three-pointers made. Not bad for a two-year player. Even better for someone considered a slasher who would get his points around the bucket.

Groves' true importance to the team lies beyond his numbers, though. Although not a natural point guard, Groves has run the one-spot at times, due to inexperience at the position and Galen Morrison's suspension in mid-February. Some players might take offense to this type of switch and use the news media as a personal complaint forum. Not Groves. He continues to play where the Cats need him.

The numbers have followed. In 21 of the 24 games he's played this year, Groves has scored in double figures. A 30-point effort against Texas A&M Feb. 23 couldn't be ignored, but there were games when the senior guard's contributions would barely make a blip on the radar. This type of silent performance will become abundantly clear next season, when Groves' consistency will be difficult to find.

While Groves was killing opponents softly, the energetic play of Tony Kitt was never difficult to locate. Anyone who has witnessed the relentless play and ear-to-ear smiles the senior forward is prone to display would think Kitt was starting for a conference contender, not a second-tier program. Despite this difference in team success, Kitt continues to perform at a different level.

Every practice. Every game.

Kitt is the kind of guy who doesn't play for the numbers. Sure, he's K-State's second-leading scorer and close to averaging a double-double with 9.2 rebounds, but Kitt would be just as content with 2 points and a rebound if it somehow helped the Cats earn a victory.

The memory of Tony Kitt that will always remain in my mind is how he celebrated following K-State's 69-68 comeback victory against St. Louis on Dec. 1. Or better yet, how he didn't celebrate. Kitt ran directly to the locker room when the buzzer sounded. No posturing. No need to bask in the celebration even though he hit the game-winning free throws. Just another workman-like performance for the happiest man ever to wear a K-State jersey.

Kitt and Groves each made the most out of their two-year stays in Manhattan. But Josh Reid deserves extra praise for a four-year career that included injury and two of the most challenging seasons in K-State history. The state's Mr. Basketball at Brewster High School, Reid's purple career began under difficult terms in 1996 when the Wildcats posted a 10-17 record, including a 3-13 mark in the first year of Big 12 play.

Time mended Reid's wounds with back-to-back NIT bids in the following seasons. Marriage to former K-State women's basketball star Brit Jacobson over the summer and election as the team's co-captain only added to Reid's optimism entering his senior year. But K-State's struggles reflect the kind of season Reid has experienced.

A broken foot suffered in a Dec. 20 practice kept Reid sidelined for a majority of the Cats' conference losing streak. Since returning Feb. 2 against Iowa State, Reid has been limited in minutes and has spent his practice time working on rehabilitation, instead of his shooting stroke.

His best game since the injury was a 7-point effort against Texas A&M on Feb. 23.

Saturday might be a bittersweet farewell for Reid, but you'll never hear him second-guess himself for choosing K-State. The positives will be mentioned instead.

The three players who will experience their final 40 minutes at the purple palace Saturday represent a rare breed. Each embody resilience, optimism, dedication and the true meaning of sacrifice.

While fans might not be able to reference statistics to prove the importance of Cortez Groves, Tony Kitt and Josh Reid, they'll remember the intangibles that each player provided K-State over their careers.

Good luck in the future, fellas. You deserve more than a half-empty goodbye.

K-State graduate plans to search for Earhart

By NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The crash of Amelia Earhart's plane saddened the country in the 1930s as much as President Kennedy's assassination did in the 1960s, said a member of a group planning to search for her missing plane.

"It was that big of an event," Rod Blocksme, K-State graduate, said.

Blocksme gave a presentation Thursday night in Rathbone Hall on the life and last flight of Earhart, who set out in 1937 to be the first female pilot to circumnavigate the world near the equator. The speech was sponsored by the KSU Amateur Radio Club.

An analysis of the radio communications and navigation aspects of her last flight, and the events that lead up to it were discussed. Blocksme, along with a group of engineers from Rockwell Collins, has spent the past year and a half conducting a detailed investigation of Earhart's disappearance.

In order to fully understand and research the flight, he said the team of investigators created a computerized model of the aircraft and the communication devices used, such as antennas.

They discovered that several communication devices were not able to be used, he said. The antenna on the bottom of the plane was unable to transmit after being damaged during a bad take off.

Another antenna and various devices were removed to reduce weight from the rear of the plane, and the Morse code keys were not compatible with that of the naval ship Itasca, with which they were communicating.

"There's a lot of flaky stuff that happened in retrospect," he said. "But if it would've been a successful flight, nobody would have paid attention to it."

The computerized version imitated the natural and man-made noise, the amount of power the antennas could transport and the signal strength.

"Then we set up a test," Blocksme said. "We had a girl with a voice similar to Amelia Earhart's record tapes."

Using the tapes, they reenacted Earhart and her communication with the ship at sea. They were able to predict the distance of her plane by eliminating atmospheric and man-made noise.

"A lot of things went into this," he said.

Earhart's plane lost communication with the ship, causing her and her navigator to rely on finding their planned route by calculating distance using the moon and stars.

KELLY GLASSCOCK/COLLEGIAN

Red Blocksme speaks about Amelia Earhart's last flight in her attempt to become the first female pilot to circumnavigate the globe. A search for the wreckage is planned for early April.

"They didn't receive the signal they were suppose to, so they turned too quickly and got off route," he said. "They were off course considerably to the north."

While searching for their destination, the plane ran out of gas. The plane fell into the Pacific Ocean and, along with the bodies, has never been found.

"When you look at the whole thing — the aircraft performance, the fuel, the distance — they were really on the cutting edge," Blocksme said.

He and his researchers have planned an expedition for early April in an attempt to find any remains of the plane, and another in May using a wide sonar.

John Blessing, president of the radio club, said he was impressed with how they could determine the plane's approximate distance and how they could go back and use the flight logs for research.

"Back in the day, that would've been a complication," Blessing said. "It's amazing how they can reverse engineering."

Committee monitors greek social events

By MICHELLE BERTUGLIA
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Giving up a weekend night to observe greek social events might not sound enjoyable for some, but for Tony Atchity, member of the Social Responsibility Committee, it is something he doesn't mind doing.

"I like doing it," he said. "It is something that makes the greek system look good. It makes us responsible for our own actions."

Atchity, junior in architecture, serves as a representative for Greek Affairs.

The group, as stated by the purpose statement of the SRC, says SRCs are volunteers who go to greek functions and complete compliance forms on each social event attended.

Mike Goodpasture, Interfraternity Council president, said the students who volunteer on SRC are observers who work as an educational tool, not party regulators.

"The SRCs go on once and check on a party, that is all we ask, they are not enforcers — they are observers," Goodpasture said.

The SRC was implemented in 1991 along with the current joint substance abuse policy for the Panhellenic and Interfraternity councils, Barb Robel, Greek Affairs adviser, said.

"After the drinking age changed, everyone needed to be on the same page," she said. "We were one of the first to put the policy in place."

When the SRCs go to the social event, they have six criteria they look at to check compliance.

Atchity said it is the little stuff that people forget.

"People forget to put out chips and Coke, or they occasionally forget a designated driver list," he said. "We write down the violations and either the social chair or president sign it. We observe and tell Greek Affairs what we saw."

Goodpasture said there is only so much that SRC and IFC can do when it comes to violations of the substance abuse policy.

"We get a lot of criticism for not policing our own, but it is not appropriate for our size," he said. "We are more criticized for something that we are less able to do."

SRC criteria

- Door monitors present.
- Everyone checked for identification.
- Members/guests of legal age wearing wrist band.
- Posted list of designated drivers.
- Alternative beverages present.
- Alternative food present.

Adam Dixon, IFC risk management chair and junior in accounting, said SRC members are almost always treated as authority figures when they observe a party.

Section 4f of the Greek Affairs substance abuse policy states that the SRC is to be made up of 16 members of fraternities and sororities.

Only fraternity members now serve on SRC.

Kellie McClellan, Panhellenic president, said her biggest problem with the current policy is that women do not serve on SRC because their national organizations have instructed them not to. As a result, women's parties are not reviewed by SRC.

"It is a liability issue," she said. "The national organizations feel if their women go observe a party and something bad happens, then the liability would focus on that girl and her house. Personally, if a woman wanted to be on SRC, we would let her, but she would be in trouble with her house."

Members of the greek community said they feel the SRC works well.

"It gets the job done," Atchity said. "It is not fool-proof, but it is better than having no system at all."

McClellan said she thinks a lot of people don't realize they have a peer-monitoring system and substance-abuse policy in place.

"The parties that fraternities and sororities have are in a more controlled environment than many other parties that take place in Manhattan," she said.

Former Chilean dictator free, heads for home

By MARA D. BELLABY
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LONDON — Former Chilean dictator Gen. Augusto Pinochet departed Britain a free man Thursday, ending a 16-month legal saga heralded for establishing that former leaders accused of human rights abuses are not immune from prosecution abroad.

"This has been an unprecedented case. Both I and the courts have had to navigate in uncharted territory," Home Secretary Jack Straw told the House of Commons after ruling that the 84-year-old general was mentally unfit to be extradited to Spain for trial on torture charges.

Straw also dismissed extradition requests from three other nations that contended their citizens were victims of Pinochet's regime — Belgium, France and Switzerland.

Pinochet, who doctors say suffered brain damage when he experienced two small strokes last fall, left Britain on Thursday afternoon and was expected to arrive in Santiago today after an undisclosed stopover en route.

The former dictator issued no comment as his detention in Britain came to an end, but his eldest son, Augusto Marco Antonio, said in the Chilean capital that his father received the news of his freedom "very calmly, the way he usually is, without showing his feelings and emotions."

While human rights groups expressed dismay at Straw's ruling, they also applauded the British and Spanish courts for decisions that strengthened the reach of an international law against torture that had been little known despite ratification by dozens of countries.

Under the law, which Britain adopted in 1988, torture became an international crime that any nation may prosecute and from which no one enjoys immunity.

Britain's top court of appeals, the House of Lords, cited the law in issuing its precedent-setting decision to strip Pinochet of his immunity.

"This ruling was a landmark judgment in human rights law, whose impact has been felt far beyond our shores," Straw said.

Others took note: Indonesia's former President Suharto, for example, decided last year not to seek medical care abroad for fear of being arrested.

"It has been a major victory for human rights," said Reed Brody, of the New York-based group Human Rights Watch. "The very fact that Pinochet was arrested, that four countries sought his extradition and that his claim of immunity was rejected has made the world a smaller place for people who commit atrocities."

Pinochet was arrested under a Spanish warrant Oct. 16, 1998, while recuperating from back surgery in a London hospital.

EVENT of a lifetime

STORY BY AMY CUNNINGHAM

Coordinators ease hassle, confusion of planning weddings

The question has been popped. It's time to start planning.

Jean Pfalser, bridal consultant at Margie's Bridal Plaza in Overland Park, Kan., said the first step to begin planning a wedding is telling each set of parents.

"Determine who will be hosting the event," Pfalser said. "Find out who will be contributing financially. Sometimes both sets of parents will jointly host or the two of you may be able to help out. This will establish a budget for you to work with."

Lyn Scardina, owner of Events, an event coordinating firm in Topeka, suggests hiring a wedding coordinator.

"Coordinators will make your day less stressful. Many times, I hear couples say, 'I'm glad this is over with,'" Scardina said. "If that is really the way they feel then they have wasted their money. Wedding coordinators keep things on track, and if they are good at what they do, then they will also save the couple money."

Wedding coordinators will help the couple organize how and where they spend the money available for the event, Scardina said.

"A coordinator will ask the couple what is most important to them and, based on that, budget accordingly," Scardina said. "I ask her to describe her dream wedding. This is her wedding, I want it to be a reflection of her. The bride sets the priorities. I just keep her realistic."

The next important step, Scardina said, is setting up a timeline.

"Some services, like photographers, must be booked up to a year or more in advance," Scardina said.

Once the preliminary decisions regarding budgeting and who will do the planning are made, the next step is reserving the location and time, Pfalser said.

"Talk to your fiancé about what type of wedding you want. You may be thinking small and informal or traditional, a local wedding or a destination event," Pfalser said. "Setting a location in stone is a main priority. Be willing to compromise, though. Friday evenings and Sunday afternoons may have to become an option during the peak season from April through October."

Tina Perry, local wedding coordinator/consultant, said there are many options when it comes to wedding locations.

"If you belong to a church, that may be your first option," Perry said. "You may also try local parks, historical sites and college campuses."

Phyllis Livingston, owner of Livingston's Bridal Gallery in Topeka, said it is important to shop for wedding attire early.

"It can take up to four months for a wedding gown to come in after it has been ordered,"

Livingston said.

"Bridesmaids' dresses can take four months also.

Also, 99 percent of all brides need some sort of alteration."

Livingston said she suggests brides look through magazines to get an idea of what they might like in a wedding gown.

"Most brides have looked at magazines and have an idea of what they like," Livingston said. "If they want help we are here to guide them. We recommend that they keep an open mind."

Ordering wedding attire off the Internet can save money, but due to the large number of businesses on the Internet, it also can be unreliable, Pfalser said. Another drawback of ordering off the Internet can be the lack of services, such as alterations, pressing and physically being able to try on dress choices.

"I would look for a trustworthy bridal store that has been in business with a reputable history," Pfalser said. "Check with friends and family, the Better Business Bureau and the local Chamber of Commerce for references."

K-State student argues in-state tuition requirements in court

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The odds are against a K-State student fighting for residency in order to pay in-state tuition.

The student is among the 200 to 300 who apply for residency each year, but is one of the few who decided to take the argument to district court.

Don Foster, head of the registrar committee, said an average of one student per year resorts to this method, something that rarely is successful.

"I can't remember a case that a student has won," Foster said.

The K-State student, whose name wasn't released, has not received a decision on residency, Foster said.

Students who disagree with a residency decision can go through a three-step process. They can submit an application that is reviewed by the registrar's office if they're a continuous student, by the admissions' office if they're a new student and by the Graduate School if they're a graduate student.

If a student disagrees with the decision, they can take their case to the out-of-state appeals committee, which is made up of six faculty members and a student. Academic deans nominate the faculty, and the student body president selects the student.

"The only recourse a student has at this point is to apply for a subsequent semester, unless they go to a district court," Foster said. "The court doesn't look at whether the decision was correct, but at whether the process was fair."

There are no defined rules on what makes a student a Kansas resident, so each case is looked at individually, Foster said.

When an appeal is made, a student still has to pay out-of-state tuition and will be refunded if a decision is revoked.

Several factors that have to exist for a year's residency are taken into consideration: being employed in Kansas, paying state residence taxes, owning a home and having an intent to remain permanently in Kansas are just a few.

However, there are some factors that by themselves are not enough proof, like having a Kansas voting or vehicle registration or enrolling in a Kansas post-secondary educational institution.

"The most essential thing is physical presence in a way that wouldn't be typical of a student," Foster said, referring to how living in a greek house or in the residence halls does not constitute as residency. "The second significant thing is, where does your money come from?" he said. "Is it Kansas money?"

Some students, however, don't look into applying because they already consider themselves residents.

Those who transfer from community colleges sometimes erroneously assume they'll pay in-state tuition at K-State.

"In fact, it is pretty common that people from community colleges question this," said Mary Prewitt, associate general counsel for the Kansas Board of Regents. "But a lot of community colleges have attempted to get that point across."

Most community colleges have a six-month requirement for establishing residency, and most vocational and technical schools have the 24-hour rule, she said.

A number of those transferring from community colleges are athletes at K-State.

Jim Epps, senior associate athletic director, said K-State has 105 student-athletes who are non-residents, and 39 who are residents. Both groups are on full scholarships. There are 20 non-residents and 36 residents who are on partial scholarships.

financial aid

70 percent of K-State students receive some kind of financial assistance, with in-state and out-of-state numbers almost the same.

Current K-State tuition rates, per credit hour:

Resident: $ 69.65
Non-resident: $289.75

SOURCE: LARRY MOEDER, DIRECTOR OF STUDENT FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE AND DON FOSTER, HEAD OF RESIDENCY COMMITTEE that non-residents can pay in-state tuition.

K-State 20 to 30 exchange agreements with other national and international universities, allowing students either to pay in-state tuition or a reduced out-of-state tuition.

Kelly Stirtz, senior in nutrition and kinesiology, pays in-state tuition because she qualified for the Midwest Exchange Program.

This program requires a student to be a resident in certain Midwest states and is available to those with certain majors. In addition, those who qualify have to maintain a grade point average of 3.0 or higher and cannot reapply for the program if their GPA drops.

"I checked into applying for Kansas residency, but I couldn't risk taking that year off," Stirtz said. "It wasn't worth it to me to wait a year."

"No out-of-state athletes have been able to convert to in-state," he said. "We don't even consider it."

Coaches are permitted to recruit anyone they wish, but a predominant number of athletes are from out-of-state, Epps said.

There are other ways, however,

Amusing Aristocracy

'The Rivals' to offer humor, romance Tuesday to McCain audience

The late 18th century was a time when true love was a chance to make fun of English aristocracy.

At least, that's what it is in "The Rivals," a satirical comedy written by Irish playwright Richard Brinsley Sheridan.

"The Rivals," which will be performed 7:30 p.m. Tuesday in McCain Auditorium, focuses on English aristocracy around the time of the American Revolutionary War.

The story focuses on Lydia, a wealthy heiress who falls in love with a penniless man.

Lydia's aunt, Mrs. Malaprop, objects to her niece's love because of his lower social status, and she tries to find somebody more financially stable for her.

At the same time she is interfering in her niece's love life, Mrs. Malaprop has fallen in love with an Irishman with whom she has been exchanging love letters. The problem further is complicated because the Irishman, never having seen Mrs. Malaprop, believes he is exchanging the letters with Lydia.

Thom Jackson, marketing and development officer of McCain, said "The Rivals" can be a little confusing to explain but is a good, comedic play.

"There's a lot of people double-playing roles. There's a lot of deception going on," Jackson said. "You really have to keep track of who's who and what's going on."

He said that some characters, such as Mrs. Malaprop, add a lot of humor to the play.

"Mrs. Malaprop uses the large $5-type words to make herself sound important, but she ends up using them wrong," Jackson said. "She completely butchers the English language."

He said the Acting Company, the traveling theater company performing "The Rivals," is another aspect that will enhance the play.

"The Acting Company is one of the finest theater companies in the country," Jackson said.

Richard P. Martin, director of McCain, said the company, which was founded in 1972, has a strong traditional background in theater performance.

"They have a tradition that guarantees excellence," Martin said. "They do a superb job in theater performance."

Jackson said the Acting Company's former actors include Kevin Kline, Patti LuPone and several Juilliard graduates. One of the company's current members, Angela Pierce, who plays Lydia, has a reoccurring role on the daytime soap opera, "All My Children."

"It's a very competitive company," he said. "It's very difficult to even get into the Acting Company."

For more in-depth information about the play, Daniel Davy, assistant professor of theater, is offering a free lecture before the performance.

"This is a chance to let an informed faculty member share insight into the play," Martin said.

Davy said he will go into detail about the playwright, as well as look at the generic comedy and cultural context of the play.

"I'm not assuming the audience knows the play," Davy said. "So, I'm going to put the play into context and suggest things to look for."

The lecture

begins at 6:30 p.m. in McCain 204.

Martin said "The Rivals" is a good opportunity for students to see polished actors in professional theater, which they need to see from time to time.

"It's a good chance for students to see the work that's a part of our Western heritage," he said. "This is a great chance to see something really enjoyable."

Tickets for "The Rivals" are $20 for general public, $18 for seniors and $10 for students. They can be ordered at the McCain Box Office or by calling 532-6428.

Puccini opera next in McCain Performance Series

By TARYN FORT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

The power of the opera should not be underestimated.

At 8 p.m. Saturday, the Teatro Lirico d'Europa will perform Giacomo Puccini's last opera, "Turandot." The presentation is in coordination with the McCain Performance Series.

"This opera ranks up with many of what are considered the greatest operas ever written and performed," said Thom Jackson, market and development officer of McCain Auditorium. "The score contains one very famous song, 'Nessun dorma,' which will be recognizable to many because it is Pavarotti's most famous song. It was used at the last Olympic games and most recently performed in China's Red Square."

The opera is the tale of a Chinese princess named Turandot who challenges princes to solve three riddles. If the riddles cannot be solved, the challenger loses his head. Whoever solves them will receive Turandot's hand in marriage.

A Middle Eastern prince, Calaf, takes the challenge and succeeds. He then puts forth a challenge to Turandot as a way out of the impending marriage.

If she can discover his name before dawn, she still can have him put to death. If not, the marriage will proceed.

"Nessun dorma" translates into "Nobody shall sleep," Jackson said. "Nobody in the kingdom is allowed sleep that night until Turandot can find someone who can tell her the real name of Calaf before dawn."

The opera will be performed in Italian with English subtitles.

"Even though the show will all be in Italian, this should not discourage college students, or anyone for that matter, from coming," Jackson said.

"Given my knowledge of opera, it does not matter if you understand the language. The body language of the actors and the exquisite sets and costumes tell the story all in itself. English translation will be provided, but the beauty of this opera does not lie in the understanding of the Italian."

The touring company for Turandot provides the audience with a full orchestra and chorus that brings the entire member count for this performance up to 150 people.

"It is very rare that a touring company, especially from Europe, would bring an entire orchestra," Jackson said. "The expense in bringing an entire orchestra is immense, but only adds to the show. I think that anyone who takes the time to come will do nothing but enjoy this performance."

The main characters of the opera have years of professional experience, including singing with such companies as the Metropolitan Opera, The Bolshoi Opera of Moscow and La Scala of Milan.

"Having seen an opera that was performed by a company that is so highly regarded as this one, I can only suggest to people to attend," Theresa Goodson, senior in graphic design, Manhattan residents also have the opportunity to hear Jean Sloop, professor of music, discuss the opera an hour before the show begins.

The free presentation is a part of McCain's Pre-Performance Lecture Series and will be in McCain 205.

"I definitely recommend the pre-performance lecture," said Terri Lee, public programming and performance manager at McCain. "The information will make the opera more accessible for college students or anyone who would like some background into the history and actual storyline of the show."

Rocker returns to Braves

By PAUL NEWBERRY
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KISSIMMEE, Fla. — A clearly humbled John Rocker arrived for spring training Thursday and took the first steps toward mending the strained relationship with his teammates.

At a closed clubhouse meeting, Rocker was described as near tears as he apologized and pleaded with his Atlanta Braves teammates, "Please, guys, let me play."

Rocker also read a brief apology to reporters before joining the rest of the team on the field for the first time since his divisive comments in a December issue of Sports Illustrated that disparaged gays, minorities and foreigners.

"I'm a little bit immature," Rocker said. "There's a side of me that needs to grow up a little bit. I have to learn to deal with frustration."

He played catch with fellow reliever Rudy Seanez and threw in the bullpen prior to the first exhibition game of the spring. Manager Bobby Cox said he expects to use Rocker in a game in eight to 10 days.

His arrival came a day after baseball's independent arbitrator cut the reliever's suspension in half, ruling he should sit out the first 14 days of the regular season for his offensive remarks. In addition, Rocker's $20,000 fine was cut to $500.

While the decision by arbitrator Shyam Das brought finality to the disciplinary part of the process, Rocker now must win back respect in the Braves' clubhouse. Teammates have grumbled that his bombastic, self-centered persona was annoying even before the magazine interview.

"He's got a long road ahead of him," said outfielder Brian Jordan, one of Rocker's most vocal critics. "He's got to deal with this in every city, with every fan. The hard part is just beginning for John Rocker."

But he seemed to have plenty of support in central Florida. Rocker was cheered after his workout and stopped to sign autographs for about 10 minutes along the first-base line. "We still love you, John!" a woman yelled.

"First Amendment!" another fan screamed.

Shortly after arriving at the ballpark, Rocker addressed Cox, the coaching staff and his teammates in the clubhouse. According to accounts of the meeting from teammates, Rocker started out speaking in front of his locker, but slowly moved toward the middle of the room.

He spoke for about 10 minutes, expressing regret for his comments and trying to explain his actions.

Then, he took questions from those in the room. Cox spoke first, followed by pitchers Terry Mulholland, Tom Glavine and John Smoltz, first baseman Randall Simon, coach Ned Yost, outfielder Reggie Sanders and Jordan.

Simon, a native of Curacao who was referred to in the article as a "fat monkey," asked Rocker how he felt about Latin players. Jordan encouraged Rocker to address the media head-on. Sanders stressed to Rocker that he accept responsibility for his comments. Yost became angry as he recounted some of the lurid details in the article.

"Ned asked him how it felt to say all that stuff," catcher Eddie Perez said. "Rocker said, 'Please guys, let me play. I want to play for the Braves.' I think he wanted to cry."

Prior to the clubhouse meeting, he met privately with Simon. Rocker asked for forgiveness and invited the first baseman and his wife to dinner this week.

"I looked at him in the face and he showed me he really regrets what he said," Simon said. "I saw in his eyes that he was kind of sad."

Commissioner Bud Selig, who imposed the harsher penalty Jan. 31, said the ruling by Das "completely ignores the sensibilities of those groups of people maligned by Mr. Rocker and disregards the player's position as a role model for children."

Selig banned Rocker from all 45 days of spring training and the first 28 days of the season. Rocker and the players' association asked the arbitrator to overturn the decision, saying it was out of line with past sanctions.

More than 100 reporters gathered at a fieldhouse next door to the Braves' ballpark for a news conference by Rocker, but he only read the statement and took no questions.

"I hope in this coming year to somehow redeem myself," he said. "I am extremely sorry for the stress and confusion I have brought on the Braves' organization."

apparently was distraught over bad grades, but authorities in Kansas and Buffalo said they could not confirm that.

The car was registered to his mother and was found abandoned earlier Wednesday along Interstate 29 in northwest Missouri, just across the state line from Kansas.

Widman was a part-time deputy who was just hours short of his degree in criminal justice from Washburn University in Topeka, said Sheriff Lamar Shoemaker. Widman had been with the department for a year, and had participated in a ride-along program for two years before that in which he observed deputies work.

Smith started shooting at the officers near the Wal-Mart, then fled, Shoemaker said. No one was hurt.

Officers tracked him to an area farther west, about 150 feet off of U.S. Highway 36.

The woods were cordoned off and officers searched the area using dogs, a helicopter and an airplane. As the two troopers and a third officer who was not identified got close, Smith ran out and started firing.

The two troopers returned fire, and Smith was killed.

Smith, the son of Buffalo police Lt. Thomas C. Smith, was reported as having run away Tuesday. The Buffalo News reported that he and a window was shattered.

Widman later died at a hospital.

It was unclear whether Widman searched Smith before putting him in the car. The gun apparently was in a duffel bag Smith was carrying.

Shoemaker said it also was unknown what led to the shooting.

"Both parties who know aren't here," Shoemaker said.

Officers from several difference agencies converged on the scene. The boy was seen near the parking lot of a Wal-Mart store on the west edge of downtown Hiawatha, a town of about 3,600 people.

immediate, the city is working on a long-term, 20-year plan, "Connecting with 2020."

Heinrich said one of the benefits of working with the city is that in the future K-State might be eligible for Kansas Department of Transportation funds to do an implementation study.

Heinrich said that although one of the faculty subcommittees recommended doing nothing at this point about his proposal, they would support the students' plan.

Cost is not the only concern about the plan, though.

Clays said he does not feel that the current plan serves a wide range of students. He said the current plan would give places like University Commons Apartments an unfair recruiting advantage.

"The current plan only serves one end of campus and is not fair to all students," he said.

Presidential candidate Drew Maenche, junior in broadcast journalism, agrees that the current plan, although a good idea, does not serve the whole campus.

"I support the idea as laying down a framework," Maenche said.

However, he said he thinks the plan needs changing, but that a shuttle system is the way to go.

Maenche said he would prefer a shuttle over a garage because there is not really anywhere to put a garage now, and it only is a temporary solution.

"In a few years, you'll just have to build another one," he said.

For students such as himself who live on the other side of campus, the plan ignores them, Maenche said.

He said he thinks the plan could work, but needs a few more routes.

"We support a mass transit system, and we'd really like to see it implemented," he said. "Then more people would be able to use it."

Clays said he was concerned about the effect a shuttle system would have on traffic around campus.

"Sending traffic to Bramlage is not a wise idea," he said.

He said it also would increase traffic on Denison Avenue, which already is dangerous enough.

Simpson, junior in animal sciences and industry and chairwoman of the event. "This is our way of contributing to it."

The contest consists of four divisions: community, faculty, students and greeks, and two categories: taste and presentation.

First and second place will be given in both categories for each division.

Prizes include certificates to eating establishments in Manhattan and steak knives donated by the Certified Angus Beef and Certified Hereford Beef programs.

"We ask them to sponsor us because of their involvement in the beef industry," Simpson said.

Simpson said that besides the recipe and taste, judges look for how the dish is presented.

"Last year's winners had prepared their dish and then garnished it while talking to the judges. That really impressed them," she said.

Judges this year are Karen Tanner, Kansas Cattlewomen member; Daniel Fung, professor of animal sciences and industry; and Travis Litton, senior in animal sciences and industry.

The Collegiate Cattlewomen also promote the beef industry and agriculture by their involvement in Ag Venture. The members go to elementary schools around Kansas and teach students about agriculture and the cattle industry.

Missed deadline causes violations

By DANEDRI THOMPSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Governing Association candidates stayed within spending limits, but several candidates missed the deadline for submitting expenditure reports, which resulted in campaign violations.

"It's a minor offense," Travis Morgan, Student Senate elections chair, said.

Those who missed the Friday deadline will be fined up to $10 and have until Tuesday to turn in the reports. He said some candidates turned their expenditure reports in Friday but missed the 4 p.m. deadline.

"If they still got it in by Friday, we only fined them $5," he said.

He said there were candidates running for more than one office who only submitted one report. He said those candidates probably didn't realize they needed to turn in reports for each office.

"That was probably by accident," he said.

If candidates miss the Tuesday deadline, it will become a major offense. He said the Elections Committee could decide to keep candidates from taking office for major offenses.

"Basically, any votes those candidates get will probably be zero votes," Morgan said. "They'll still be on the ballot, but votes for them won't count."

23rd annual Special 'K' sale features K-State beef

Hands-on experience in marketing purebred cattle culminated Friday with the 23rd annual Special "K" Edition performance bull and elite heifer sale.

The sale, which was in conjunction with this year's 87th annual Cattlemen's Day, provided students with the opportunity to market K-State's own cattle herd, said Miles McKee, professor of animal sciences and industry.

"Students do everything but cry auctioneer," McKee said.

Preparation for the sale began in October with 42 students enrolled in Livestock Sales Management. Students divided into committees ranging from set-up and decorating to clerking and registering buyers.

Originally, the sale was in the fall as a one-breed sale and rotated yearly among the Angus, Hereford and Simmental breeds raised by the unit. In spring 1987, all the breeds were combined into one sale, in conjunction with the Little American Royal.

In 1994, the sale was included with Cattlemen's Day, and it has been the first Friday in March ever since.

"We have a large crowd with Cattlemen's Day," said Dave Nichols, professor of animal sciences and industry. "The sale tops off the day's activities."

The objective of the sale was to provide animals to the commercial bull buyer, he said.

"K-State is traditionally a good source of bulls for Starting today, DARS is open for business.

The Degree Audit Report System is the newest feature on the KATS. It gives students an up-to-the-minute report on their degree requirements and an opportunity to determine how classes taken for one curriculum would count for a different one.

Susan Woodard, assistant to the registrar, said the registrar's office has been working on the program, created by Miami University in Oxford, Ohio, for the past several years.

"It gives the student a chance to plug courses into a given degree program," Woodard said. "It covers all course work taken at K-State and transfer courses from community colleges from the fall of 1998."

Woodard said that because there is no other document that shows how transfer courses fit into degree programs at K-State, DARS should become popular and be useful to students transferring from other institutions.

Not every K-State degree program is available yet, Woodard said. This is due to a change in some programs' requirements that have not been reflected yet.

"It's a continuous updating process," Woodard said.

A slide show is available at www.ksu.edu/registrar/dars/slideshow that gives a tutorial for the basic functions of DARS, in addition to links to the system.

After logging on DARS, students are prompted for which type of report is requested. The student is free to do other tasks while DARS is generating the report.

"It takes a little longer for DARS because it is a report generator, while KATS is simply a retrieval system," Woodard said.

Woodard also said any chosen reports can be accessed by students for up to two days after the reports are requested.

A printout of a sample report shows

DARS basics

The Degree Audit Report System does not assure degree certification, but it can be used to assist students and advisers during schedule planning time. Via KATS, students will be able to:

- View degree requirements.
- See what requirements have been met and what courses still need to be taken.
- Begin planning the semester's courses before meeting with your adviser.
- See how previously taken courses count towards another degree program.

K-State/USC football game not scheduled

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State football team will not play the University of Southern California in the near future.

The two schools had been discussing playing a home-at-home series. In the proposed series, the K-State home game would have been played at Arrowhead Stadium in Kansas City, Mo.

The series tentatively was scheduled for 2001 and 2002.

Associate director of athletics Jim Epps said all questions should be referred to K-State head coach Bill Snyder.

"You would have to talk with Coach Snyder on that," Epps said. "He has all of the particulars."

Snyder could not be reached for comment, but Kent Brown, K-State Sports Information director, said Snyder has full control over whom K-State plays.

In recent years, K-State has been criticized across the country for its inability to schedule top out-of-conference opponents. However, Snyder said in an interview earlier this year that he will schedule teams according to what he thinks is best for the program.

"My feeling about our schedule is that I want to do what I feel is very best for our football team year in and year out," Snyder said. "I can't tell you that it ends up exactly that way, but that's what the attempt is."

"I think that when I say this is based on a year-in-year-out deal, what I think is best for 1999 football team might not be the same for the 2000 team or the 2001, or the 1998, or 1997. So it changes year in and year out."

Former player arrested Friday for kidnapping

By JENNIFER GIER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A K-State football player was arrested last week for kidnapping a former K-State football player.

First-string offensive lineman Thomas Barnett was arrested early Friday morning for one felony count of kidnapping and one felony count of making a criminal threat against former K-State running back Leon Edwards.

According to a press release issued by the Riley County Police Department, Barnett saw Edwards at a bar in Aggieville and told Edwards he needed to speak with him. Barnett then asked Edwards to accompany him to his vehicle so they could talk.

While in the car, Barnett told Edwards that he wanted his shotgun back. Barnett had given his shotgun to Edwards as a settlement for a gambling bet. According to the press release, "during the conversation Mr. Barnett threatened to shoot and kill Mr. Edwards if the gun was not returned to him."

Edwards told Barnett the gun was at his mother's house in Wichita. Edwards attempted to escape from the car, and as he was doing so, Barnett sped out of the parking lot where the car was parked. Despite Edwards' attempts to escape, Barnett continued to speed toward Wichita driving 90 mph, according to the press release.

Once the men arrived in Wichita, Barnett drove to Edwards' mother's home. Edwards allegedly told Barnett to stay in the car while he went to retrieve the gun. Once in the house, Edwards called 911. When police arrived they found Barnett sitting in his car in the driveway. The police officers also found a small amount of marijuana in Barnett's car.

After Edwards made a statement, Barnett was taken into custody at 3:36 a.m. Barnett has been charged in Riley County with kidnapping and making a criminal threat. In Wichita, Barnett was

Students to start company before graduation in May

K-State students are starting a company, creating a product, marketing the product and selling it, all before they graduate in May.

Twenty-six students in the Manufacturing Systems Design Analysis class are faced with this challenge.

Strategic Designs is producing a K-State chess board.

"We are actually designing a prototype right now," said Chris Althoff, senior in industrial engineering and chief executive officer of Strategic Designs.

For startup capital, the class members invested in stock for their company. They bought shares at $1 a share and were limited to a maximum of 85 shares.

Class members elected officers for positions such as chief executive officer, chief financial officer, chief marketing officer, chief production officer, chief engineer and executive assistant.

The class is structured to teach industrial-engineering students every aspect of an organization, Althoff said.

Michelle Jones, senior in industrial engineering and chief marketing officer of Strategic Designs, said the group's main focus is the All-University Open House, March 31 and April 1.

She said they will have two displays showing videos of the production process.

"We all work together as if we were a real company, but we are actually financed like a student organization," Jones said. "In marketing we discover who our target market is, and how they would like their product built."

Evan Carstedt, senior in industrial engineering, is the chief production officer.

His committee is in charge of all safety procedures in the lab, training everyone on machines, buying all necessary raw materials, scheduling the production, designing all jigs and fixtures, and the prototype.

Education, transportation and taxation were among the topics discussed Saturday at the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce Sunrise Legislative Forum at Manhattan Town Center.

The forum allowed Manhattan citizens to ask state legislators questions about pending Kansas legislation. Sen. Lana Olen, R-Manhattan; Rep. Edward Pugh, R-Wamego; Rep. Vern Osborne, R-St. George; and Rep. Jeff Peterson, R-Manhattan, all attended the monthly forum.

Olen said education in Kansas would not be hurt even with recent budget cuts.

"The budget is in good shape," she said.

However, she warned citizens about severe teacher shortages in the future.

Peterson supported Olen's comments about the budget.

"We are in good shape today considering the circumstances," he said.

In addition to comments about education funding and improvements, Pugh said he hopes advanced education in community colleges will help prepare students for school in four-year universities.

Osborne said he favored a bill that would benefit farmers.

The bill would allow farmers, whose crops are eaten by deer, to kill more deer during hunting season.

Activists recall 'Bloody Sunday'

By SONYA ROSS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SELMA, Ala. — Thirty-five years after police beat and bloodied voting rights marchers at the Edmund Pettus Bridge, modern-day civil rights activists traced the same path Sunday with Bill Clinton — a white Southerner who credited that march for his rise to the presidency.

Clinton came to Selma to pay homage to the event known as Bloody Sunday alongside two of the men who engineered it: Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., and Hosea Williams, former aides to the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. Both men were badly beaten that day. Lewis marches every year to mark the anniversary and invited Clinton to attend this year.

More than 10,000 people stood peacefully in a downtown intersection for the ceremony. As Clinton spoke, a black man in the crowd waved an oversized American flag, while a white man beside him held up two fingers in a peace sign.

"I, too, am a son of the South, the old segregated South. Those of you who marched 35 years ago set me free, too, on Bloody Sunday," Clinton said. "Free to know you, to work with you, to love you. I thank you all for what you did here."

Clinton locked arms with Lewis and King's widow, Coretta, and led marchers across the bridge. Williams, wearing denim overalls and red sneakers and clutching a metal cane, was pushed across in a wheelchair.

Halfway across, they stopped and prayed. Then they marched on, singing "We Shall Overcome." On the opposite side, Alabama state troopers — white and black — and National Guardsmen saluted the marchers as they approached. The masses who followed covered the small bridge in a sea of people of all races, a crowd so large many marchers only traveled a few steps.

"You really just get a sense of the fear and the tension people had," said Deidre Hill, 29, of Troy, Ala., who marched with her parents. "This shows that education and reading are really important. If you don't know where you've been, you can't go forward."

Brutal images of the ugly violence on the bridge galvanized many people far outside the South to the civil rights movement and helped win support for the Voting Rights Act of 1965. Clinton paid tribute to three people who died in that struggle: local activist Jimmy Lee Jackson, the Rev. James Reeb, who died after being beaten at a march; and Viola Liuzzo, shot to death while driving other volunteers.

"We honor them for the patriots they were," Clinton said. "The Voting Rights Act was signed in ink in Washington, but it was signed in blood in Selma."

On March 7, 1965, all-white Alabama state troopers and sheriff's deputies used tear gas, nightsticks and whips to break up an attempt by blacks and white integrationists to march 50 miles to the state Capitol in Montgomery to protest the denial of voting rights to blacks in Selma.

Some marchers retaliated with bricks and bottles. Lewis, then chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, was among 17 blacks who were hospitalized.

Two weeks later, under the protection of a federal court, King led hundreds of people on the long walk to the capital. The march helped launch the careers of black leaders, including Lewis, but it also helped make way for a new kind of white Southern politician — moderate, attuned to civil rights issues and appealing to both black and white voters.

Without the changes set in motion in 1965, Clinton said, "Atlanta never would have had the Super Bowl or the Olympics, and Jimmy Carter and Bill Clinton would never have been elected president of the United States."

While applauding the advances in black political participation and other hopeful markers, Clinton said America still has many bridges to cross. He took direct aim at two issues that still cause friction: the Confederate flag and mistrust between minorities and the police.

"As long as the waving symbol of one American's pride is the shameful symbol of another American's pain, we have another bridge to cross," Clinton said.

Later he said, "As long as African-Americans and Latinos anywhere in America believe they are unfairly targeted by police because of the color of their skin, and the police believe they are unfairly judged by their communities because of the color of their uniforms, we have another bridge to cross."

Feuding neighbors take disagreement over damaged property to 'Ricki Lake' show

By REED DUNN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The residents at 922 and 924 Bertrand St. are happy to be fighting.

Seth Stone said he was called by producers of the "Ricki Lake" show about why his neighbor, Carrie Jo Wilson, might have complaints about him and his roommate, Monte McClure, senior in secondary education and geography.

"Apparently, we are not very good neighbors," Stone said. "We have thank-yous from our other neighbors that say we are."

The feuding-neighbors episode will be taped Tuesday, but the exact air date has not been determined.

Stone said he never thought anything would come of the situation, but said he expected the show to be a good time.

"I think it'll be fun, but people have to realize it's just a show," he said. "It's strictly for entertainment."

Wilson said she knows going to the show seems ridiculous, but she thinks it's a good opportunity to appear on television. Even though she thinks the problem won't be solved through going to the show, she said she thinks it is a great opportunity for a free trip to New York.

"I'm going on the show to make an ass of myself," she said. "Andy Warhol said everyone deserves 15 minutes of fame."

Damage to her property is why

Wilson said she called the show.

"They've damaged my property," she said. "I don't know how it started, because they just started doing stuff to my house."

After a number of tries to get on television, Wilson said she was shocked the producers even responded to her call.

"I was a little amazed," Wilson said. "In high school I would call and try to get on."

McClure said he thinks problems existed because when he and his roommates moved in around August, Wilson already was established in the residence next door. Problems have not occurred between the two households for some time, McClure said.

"We really haven't been feuding much lately," he said. "She didn't welcome us too well when we first got here."

Wilson said she thinks the whole thing is ridiculous, but said she hopes to take a good memory from the situation.

"I think it's foolish to argue, but I also think it's foolish to damage other people's property," Wilson said. "I don't think going to the 'Ricki Lake' show is going to solve anything, but maybe we can laugh it off."

Laughing it off is not what McClure said he thought will come of the situation.

"I don't think this is going to solve anything at all," he said. "If anything, it's just going to get worse."

McCurry, Heller ticket earns Collegian endorsement

The Collegian Editorial Board believes Jesse McCurry is the best candidate for the position of K-State student body president.

McCurry, along with vice presidential running mate Kylo Heller, have displayed innovative ideas, realistic goals and fresh faces — three characteristics that make them an appealing choice for student government's top spots.

The pair's platform is based largely on the premise of listening to students' concerns and responding to what students find important — a refreshing break from typical platforms. This fresh plan is a large part of what set McCurry and Heller apart from their competition in a close vote, including their most formidable opponents, Jake Worcester and Dana Pracht.

Worcester and Pracht, while more experienced in student government and more refined in the political arena, did not supply enough new ideas and logical solutions to overcome McCurry and Heller.

Fresh ideas — such as a pep assembly-like program to involve students, a Campus Forum-like number to communicate with the student body president and increased use of K-State's cable channel — were enough to put McCurry and Heller atop the list, in spite of their limited experience with city and state government.

The ideas this ticket promotes are realistic and, to a large extent, could be completed during their term in office. However, many of the other presidential tickets lack the combination of these possibilities.

While McCurry and Heller certainly would be the best choice for student body president and vice president, there are several other tickets that would do an exemplary job. Here is the board's analysis of all of the candidates.

Chris Brooks/Andrew Miller

With limited experience, expertise and ideas, these two candidates seem to have no business jostling for the top spots in student government.

Their only goal of note is an extended Thanksgiving break, an idea that is irrelevant with a fall break already on the way. In addition, it would require students to return to school earlier each semester.

The candidates showed limited knowledge of campus affairs and presidential duties. In addition, a main reason they listed for running was that they had a good chance to get involved.

Jeremy Claeys/Amy Metzinger

This team boasts some of the most groundbreaking platform issues — including improving diversity in student government — but unrealistic solutions to other important problems will be its undoing.

The pair articulated plans that could bring much-needed diversity to student government through standing committees and also proposed a tuition freeze that would last three years.

The tuition freeze, however, would provide only temporary relief to students' ballooning educational costs. In addition, they favored a parking garage to the gradual implementation of a shuttle system, an idea that would create both an eyesore and an inferior solution to a shuttle system.

Justin Gunter/Matt Kelso

Concern for students' asses only can carry you so far in a presidential race.

These candidates want to improve the quality of toilet paper on campus and add push or pull signs to the doors on campus, specifically at Cardwell Hall. They do this because, as they will tell you, they care about your asses.

These goals, however, are easy enough to accomplish and are not enough to base a campaign around. But rest easy, because even if not elected, the duo vows to add signs to Cardwell's doors themselves.

Steve Hall/Ryan Hoskinson

This tandem excelled in many areas, including experience, platform ideas and approachability, but simply failed to display superiority to other candidates in these same categories.

These candidates plan to confront advising problems and improve GTA standards if elected. While these are important issues, they were not enough to make the candidates rise to the top of the list.

While their issues were not ground-breaking, they would do a fine job if elected. They are realistic in their goals and would do well representing K-State to the students, city, state Legislature and Board of Regents.

Drew Maenche/Ali Karimi

This pair's grassroots campaign was not enough to overshadow the lack of solutions they are able to provide for their many campaign platforms.

The candidates' primary drawback is the vagueness of their campaign. They explain the need for increased diversity, the potential of mass transit in Manhattan and need to maximize student money.

They fail, however, to explain how they will address these problems in a realistic fashion.

They did, however, show a genuine concern for fellow students and a dedication to their jobs, including a promise to attend city commission meetings.

Jared Teach/Stam Burkin

While this duo provided several interesting platform issues and good ideas, their limited leadership experiences and knowledge of student government did them in.

They offered several good ideas focusing on student life, including reducing class size and improving GTA quality, adviser quality and campus lighting.

Their lack of diverse leadership experience, however, did not make them appear capable of achieving these lofty goals they have placed on their agenda.

Rick Wooten/Adam Shea

This presidential ticket was surprisingly intriguing.

Because of their string of humorous campaign photos, there is a tendency to take these candidates lightly. Their campaign, however, is quite serious. They have a genuine understanding of relevant issues and of how they could be solved.

Their weakness is they are sitting on the fence between a serious and humorous campaign. Still, they are quite capable of doing the job. In addition, they donated the funds they raised for their campaign to the Women's Crisis Center, proving the quality of their characters.

Jake Worcester/Dana Pracht

This pair was extraordinary enough to prompt significant support, but a rather mundane platform allowed them to slip into second.

Because their platform issues were rather typical, this pair did not elicit much excitement for their campaign. Nevertheless, those issues were also strong because they are realistic possibilities.

In addition, their diverse experiences in leadership roles showed them to be a capable pair of candidates, second only to the fresh faces and ideas provided by the McCurry/Heller ticket.

There were many exemplary candidates who would do a fine job if elected, but none showed the potential McCurry and Heller displayed through the overall presentation of their platform.

fast, cheap and OUT OF CONTROL

Steady rise in auto-related deaths, injuries create need for refresher course on driving fundamentals

The United States averages more deaths by automobiles per year than murders per year.

Between 1989 and 1993, the U.S. averaged about 22,000 murders per year and about 40,000 deaths per year by automobile accidents, according to the Web site www.cals.ncsu.edu/course/are/12/lecture/lecture2/sld017.htm.

Though the information is slightly dated, the trend appears to be continuing. In a study done in 1995, there were 43,363 automobile accidents that resulted in death. Obviously, the numbers are not diminishing. This study was found on the Web page www.infoplease.com/ipa/A0005124.html. This study also found that, in 1995, there was one automobile-related death every 12 minutes and one injury every 14 seconds. Scary thought, huh?

So, what I propose is a refresher course on driving. It seems as though once we graduate from drivers' education, we forget everything we learned. For your learning pleasure, I have listed the ABC's of driving (with the exception of a few letters).

■ A driver's license is a responsibility. I know, it's corny, but, seriously, if you can't drive, get off the road so those of us who can don't have to worry about your actions.

■ Buckle up. Or don't, if you so choose. But would seat belts be put in cars if there weren't a good reason? I think not.

■ Cutting people off. Don't do it, for crying out loud. If a car is coming, wait for it to pass, then go. Also, don't move in front of a car when there isn't enough room for you.

■ Dotted lines. These are used to separate two lanes with traffic going the same way. Do not try to play Pac-Man and drive over all of them. Stay between them.

■ Entrance ramps. Speed up when you are on them. How do you expect to merge with traffic going 70 mph when you are entering the highway going 30 mph? It is devoid of common sense.

■ Gestures. Try not to make rude gestures to other drivers. I have, and I admit I was wrong. But all it does is spur road rage (of which I am also guilty). On the upside, if everyone follows these rules, then the gestures will not be necessary.

■ Headlights. They were put on your car for a reason. Use them when it is dark, especially. If they are broken, then fix them. Brake lights also are very important, and if they do not work, then you need to fix them. Think about what brake lights are for — without them no one would know you were stopping. That's a problem.

■ Ice. Driving on ice is not that difficult, and you would think Kansans would know how to do it by now. If you hit a patch of ice, do not brake.

From there you should be able to figure it out.

■ Know where you are going. Stopping, then going, then stopping again, etc. will only cause anger and very likely, a fender bender.

■ Lanes. On most roads there are two of them. Roads are like that for a reason. The left lane is generally the fast lane, and the right lane is the lane for slower drivers. Do not drive in the fast lane and go the same speed as the person in the slow lane. It irritates people trying to use the fast lane for its intended purpose. Besides, it's not your ticket.

■ Manners. Above all, these are key to driving.

Usually, if you are walking down a hall and a person is trying to get around you, you will let that person by. This and other acts of common courtesy apply to the road as well.

■ Off-ramps. On highways, these are the ramps you take to exit. For the most part, exit ramps are fairly long, and there is no reason to slow down to 40 mph on the highway just to prepare to leave it.

■ Pay attention. An inattentive driver is the worst kind. Be aware of the cars around you, what they are doing, and what they want to do (see lanes).

■ Red on the street lights do not mean go.

■ Stop signs. You know, those funny red octagon-shaped things. "Stop" does not mean "drive right through me without looking." For the sake of the other drivers on the road, at least pause for a long moment to look for traffic thoroughly.

■ Turn signals. These, too, were put on your car for a reason. Please do not stop in the middle of a road without giving an indication to the cars behind you why you are stopping in the middle of the road. Furthermore, if a car is waiting at an intersection that you are turning at, it is only polite to let them know so that they may turn, too.

Additionally, don't drive with your blinker on if you are not turning. Also, blinkers are helpful in letting a car in another lane know if you are moving in front of them or if you want to move in front of them (see cutting off).

■ Skip U, V, W, X and Y.

■ Zones, school and otherwise. Follow the speed limits and regulations in special zones — if not for the sake of other drivers, then for the safety of pedestrians and children.

That's all I have for now. But if I think of any more, I'll be sure to let you know. Besides, most of you have the fundamentals down, and I don't need to tell you everything. For the rest of you, use common sense, pay attention, and be courteous.

True. True.

Thanks to David Levin's column about morality found in logic, we have an intelligent viewpoint on religion and morality, as opposed to Jeff Elliott's viewpoint on simple-minded religion.

If they didn't want us to sleep in the library, they wouldn't put in such comfortable couches and chairs.

Jeff, I think you should put the smackdown on Joe for letting all of these people bash you in the Forum. I mean, really, I think you're a pretty good guy.

How long must these crusades continue in the Forum? Take your battles elsewhere, soldiers.

K-State should be proud that one of its professors won the beer-drinker-of-the-year award at Little Apple Brewery.

David Levin should be on the Opinion page every day, because he is the only one who makes any sense.

What's up with the $1.50 gas prices? I'll be forced to turn to a life of prostitution just to fill up my tank.

What exactly were you guys going for with the whole "Shoot Yourself" campaign? Wit? You failed miserably.

Hey, thanks, Jeff Elliott. I just turned atheist.

Yearbook staff: get some tact. "Shoot Yourself" is not a pleasant campaign.

For all you Asbury bashers, if Kelvin Howell could make a free throw, we'd be a lot better off.

Cake sculpture eaten at Willard Gallery within 1st day of show

By EMILY COCHRAN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Marie Antoinette once said, "Let them eat cake."

"Hot and Wet," the masters of fine arts show in Willard Gallery, opened amidst controversy early last week when a piece of sculpture was eaten in the gallery after just 24 hours on display. Some are calling it vandalism, others see it as art, but both the head of the Department of Art and the Exhibition Committee chairman have declined to comment on the situation.

Jody Kingery-Page, graduate student in sculpture, submitted an edible photo-cake with an image of himself attached to the cake at the student show. The next day fellow graduate sculptor Brian McCallum made a guest list, sent out invitations and threw a party in the gallery.

McCallum, joined by his wife, their two children and several graduate students in art, ate the art on the display last Monday without the permission or knowledge of the artist. McCallum filmed the event, and party guests joined him in hanging paper party hats on the other sculptures.

At one point Kingery-Page stopped by the gallery, and McCallum told him to leave.

Although there has been speculation that Kingery-Page played a role in the destruction of his own piece in the name of performance art, his gallery statement suggests otherwise. He responded to the actions of his fellow graduate students in a letter he posted in his empty gallery display space on Wednesday.

The response read: "An act of censorship was performed by a group of my peers under the guise of, I assume, 'a continuation of the piece.' To those folks I say this, 'get your own ideas.'"

The story does not end here.

Before the exhibition reception Friday, McCallum submitted "Cake Not Cake," and used Kingery-Page's gallery space to display a new cake printed with a picture of himself eating his colleague's cake, an apology note, a framed picture of the original cake and a photo album of pictures and comments from Tuesday's cake party. Neither Kingery-Page nor McCallum attended the reception.

McCallum declined a phone interview, but in his photo album he describes that upon seeing the original cake he was "immediately filled with the desire to dig in. Here was an art obviously challenging the relationship between artist and audience."

Brent Jackson, graduate student in English, and an acquaintance of both parties involved, disagrees.

"There is a fine line between stupid and clever," Jackson said. "Jody crossed the line towards clever, and the people who ate the cake crossed the line towards stupid. It's one thing to eat the cake in collaboration with the artist, but to ask him to leave and then destroy his object, that's an aggressive act."

"It can only be seen as destruction. The fact that its destruction was wrought without the permission of the artist and performed by his own colleagues, I find intensely regrettable."

Jerod Morris, graduate student in ceramics, said he regrets the turn of events.

"At the time I thought it was the intention of the piece, and potentially the artist, for the cake to be eaten," Morris said. "As things have unfolded, I realize that that was a misinterpretation on my part. It was a transgression that ended up being personally harmful to the artist, and for that I am very sorry."

Lynda Andrus, Foundation Area head and associate professor of art, was upset by the actions of the people who ate the cake, and said that in her 17 years at K-State, vandalism has never been an issue.

Roger Routson, assistant professor of art, said he thought some sort of disciplinary action should be taken if the cake eating was not the intention of the artist.

"If it is determined to be vandalism, then there will be consequences," Routson said. "If Jody did not mean it as a reaction piece, then they overstepped the bounds without a doubt."

"It's really disturbing because artists put their work out there often without any payback, and when things like this happen, it just saddens the entire situation."

Art department head Anna Holcombe declined an interview and has turned this issue over to Jim Munce, associate professor of art, who leads the exhibition committee. Munce said there is not a policy on vandalism in the galleries.

As to whether this is something he and the department will consider in light of recent events, he would not speculate.

"The artists involved have not contacted me," Munce said. "I have no information on this subject. I have nothing to say now."

Gary Woodward, associate professor of art and department coordinator of graduate studies, could not be reached for comment.

Artist Kingery-Page declined to comment.

"Hot and Wet" will be on display in Willard Art gallery through Friday.

"It was a transgression that ended up being personally harmful to the artist, and for that I am very sorry."

Local man's dream of roller-skating rink to become reality for community

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Greg Humbert thumbed the 2-inch manual.

He followed every step in it to complete his dream: a 13,000 square-foot building.

"This has been a dream of ours for many, many years," Humbert said. "We've had nothing but glowing response."

His dream is housed inside the building: a roller-skating rink with a genuine hardwood maple floor.

The rink has not been completed yet, but Humbert said he's scouted the area, talked to real-estate agents and decided it will be located on East U. S. Highway 24, just west of The Money Store.

"All the action is there," he said. "Location is everything."

But the reason for building it was different. Parents prefer that their kids don't sit in front of the television, Humbert said.

"The kids in the community have really nothing to do to occupy their time," he said.

The rink will have a full-service snack bar, a skate and apparel shop and a novelty shop that will sell toys and trinkets. Games also will be available.

It will accommodate around 400 to 450 kids, Humbert said.

Although Humbert and his wife are financing half of the costs, the other half will be paid for with shares of stock, of which 49 are left.

"It is a sizable project. We're putting everything on the line," he said. "It'll be a nice investment for those who want to invest in the kids' future."

"We want the people to understand that there is an inherent risk to this venture. But we've done our homework. It'll be to their advantage to let it ride for a year or two."

Humbert started working on his dream by contacting roller skating rink, authorities, meeting with consultants, performing feasibility studies and talking with the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce.

Talking to the Chamber of Commerce, however, is not required, said Ann Harts, vice president of economic development.

"We just give them information on where to find financing, who to contact and a myriad of different topics," Harts said. "We do that with anybody. We try to act as an ombudsman."

Harts said she doesn't consider this as an economic resource for Manhattan but rather an important move for the community.

"The quality-of-life issue comes to mind immediately," she said. "It'll be a place for recreation and enjoyment."

This issue is the same one Humbert said he considers important. Social interaction is the reason he chose a roller skating rink instead of another activity.

"My love for the sport drives me. It's something that goes back to when I was 15," Humbert said, referring to the first time he put on skates. "The uniqueness about the rink is that you can get 400-plus kids interacting. I like the camaraderie."

Humbert also said he plans to have skating classes Saturday mornings.

In addition, he said he is considering renting the rink for a junior/senior prom and possibly live bands.

The prices are reasonable, Humbert said.

"It'll be cheaper than going to a movie," he said. "When kids come in, it'll hit all their senses. We're just going to let them have it."

Longhorns defeat K-State in last home game, 99-70

The K-State men's basketball season ended with a whimper Saturday.

Texas (22-7, 13-3) defeated the Cats 99-70 in a game that got ugly at certain points.

K-State head coach Tom Asbury was slapped with a technical foul with 10:44 left in the first half.

Asbury was upset with the officiating and missed picking up another one with 10:02 remaining in that half. Asbury would not comment directly after the game on the officiating, but when asked if he deserved the technical foul, he said yes.

"Oh yeah," Asbury said. "Oh yeah, no question."

When asked if he deserved a second, Asbury said he wasn't sure.

The sequence, although inspiring to the K-State players and fans, also widened the gap between the two schools.

Entering the midway point of the first half, the Cats (9-18, 2-14) were holding their own against Texas. K-State led 11-9 early in the half, and senior forward Josh Reid said the Cats came out strong.

"We were going toe-to-toe with them in the first half. The effort was there," Reid said. "I think they just wore us down in the second half."

K-State players and coaches said this was the best team they have played all season. Darren Kelly's 33 points led the Longhorns.

"He was just excellent," senior guard Cortez Groves said of Kelly. "We had a few mental lapses in the zone, but for the most part he had some good open looks and hit every opportunity he had."

Behind the shooting of Kelly and the inside play of center Chris Mihm, Texas entered halftime shooting 53 percent from the field and leading 44-35. Asbury said it was just a case of Texas being the better team.

"Texas plays like that — there will be a lot of people in deep trouble. I thought they were just excellent," Asbury said. "We have played a lot of good teams this year, and I am not sure that on this

Seniors give strong effort in final Bramlage match

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State men's basketball season might not have been the season envisioned by three Wildcat seniors, but Saturday's game against No. 15/16 Texas was still a sweet goodbye.

Despite losing 99-70 to the Longhorns in what was the Wildcats' final home game of the season, seniors Tony Kitt, Cortez Groves and Josh Reid tried to will the Cats to a victory.

After being honored prior to the game with their parents in attendance, the trio of veterans opened the contest scoring the Cats' first 11 points in the first five minutes, giving them an 11-9 lead.

It was the culmination of their last regular season. Head coach Tom Asbury said he and the coaching staff talked to the seniors early in the season about what their last season should mean and stand for.

"That means a lot to these guys," Asbury said. "They don't know how much it means to them until they reflect down the years."

"We start talking about it early on, about the importance of senior night, but the whole senior-year experience — trying to make the most of it and these three guys have. We've really struggled as a team, but attitude-wise, they've been great."

Groves, a 6-foot-5-inch guard from Kansas City, Mo., scored a team-high 17 points in the game, while Reid, a 6-foot-6-inch forward from Brewster, Kan., chipped in with 12

Improving recruiting, renewing school support necessary for Cats' next season

VIEWPOINT

NICK BRATKOVIC

K-State's conference record (9-18, 2-14) is sad. Is there anything worse than being 2-14 in conference play? Besides being 0-16 and homeless?

In the sports world, relatively speaking, a 2-14 conference record is lacking.

But in the grand scheme of things, nobody has suffered greatly as a result of this season, and the sun outside is shining brightly. The only thing really hurt is purple pride.

Really, the losses are pretty positive considering the current state of the world. With all the problems off the field, a losing season isn't really all that bad. Or is it?

It is hard to remember a team that I have watched so closely lose so often.

The last team I remember going 2-14 were the Kansas City Chiefs under head coach Frank Gansz. Do you remember Gansz?

If you remember, you know that after one season under the special teams guru, the Chiefs made wholesale changes and Carl Peterson and Marty Schottenheimer were brought in. It was the year that the Chiefs unveiled their five-year plan to get to the Super Bowl — a plan that still has not materialized.

Despite the failure to win a Super Bowl, the team has pursued excellence and given Kansas City memorable seasons. In other words, the team has had direction and has produced results. Maybe not championships, but the Chiefs are a world away from where they were before Peterson.

Here in Manhattan, the regular season for the K-State men's basketball program is over, and the Big 12 Conference tournament is all that remains.

It has been a difficult season, one filled with losing streaks, suspensions, rumors and strife. It has been the worst of times.

Now where does the team go? K-State Athletic Director Max

Urick has said all along that he will not discuss the coaching position until after the season. I applaud the loyalty, and I think it is a classy way to handle the situation. Urick said he will evaluate the situation after the season.

In the face of rumors, Urick has held firm. It is a smart move. If a coaching change is made, Urick will have to hire a new coach, and he will want to show the candidates that the university stands behind its coaches.

Still, regardless of who is coaching the team next season, the K-State basketball brain will need to address a few issues.

Recruiting — we have not had a top recruit in years. Under Asbury, the squad has recruited strongly in Junction City, Kan., and around the state. K-State has recruited among the community-college ranks, but Asbury hasn't been able to land a prize recruit.

One top recruit could make the Cats a mid- to higher-level program.

That has been the most frustrating thing this season. In a majority of the games, there was one player who managed to take over against K-State. On any given night, it could have been Iowa State's Marcus Fizer, Kansas' Drew Gooden or Missouri's Keyon Dooling. Saturday it was Texas' guard Darren Kelly.

The Cats have some nice players, but they need one big-time recruit. The school needs a player who can take over games and make everyone on the floor better, a player who embodies the school and gives the program an identity. In essence, a player who can lead the Cats back to the top.

It might look like a hard sell for a coach, but if they focus on the positives, then the school could land a blue-chip player. If they focus on tradition and what a football program in a similar situation accomplished, then the program will turn around. Another area that needs to be addressed is support.

Next season, regardless of who is coaching this team, K-State needs the school's support. It will be imperative that the stands be packed. The crowd, like it or not, was not a sixth man for the Cats this season.

During football season, we know full well who the home team is. However, during basketball season, Bramlage is not a tough place to play. It is a country-club environment for road teams.

Still of no fault to the fans, losing does that — it creates apathy.

The support also needs to come from the administration. In reality, only the administrators know if they have done everything to help this program succeed. I am not sure you can blame them — players play the games. Regardless, next season the efforts need to be renewed.

So, will the coaching staff return?

K-State's baseball team loses 3-game series to Sooners

Through four innings the game was a pitchers' duel, until junior outfielder Bentson Oleen hit his first home run as a Wildcat. He finished the game with two hits.

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State baseball team dropped two games on the road this weekend against Oklahoma. Results for the third game of the series were not available at press time.

In the first game, the Cats dropped a heartbreaker against the Sooners, 6-4. K-State committed two errors in the seventh and eight innings, allowing Oklahoma to score all six of its runs.

Through four innings the game was a pitchers' duel, until junior outfielder Bentson Oleen hit his first home run as a Wildcat. He finished the game with two hits.

In the seventh inning, Oklahoma went to work with the bats. The Sooners scored four runs on a Jerome Godsey double. The next inning, Oklahoma tacked on two more runs to lead 6-1.

The Cats put together a late rally and scored three runs before eventually succumbing to the Sooners. Rocky Cherry, an Oklahoma right-handed hitter, picked up the victory.

In the second game of the three-game series, Oklahoma right-handed pitcher Austin Coose recorded nine strikeouts and allowed one run in 7 2/3 innings.

It was the same old story, as the Cats, for the second time in two days, jumped out to an early lead when designated hitter Travis Andre singled home shortstop J.D. Loudabarger from third base.

Oklahoma, though, after tying the game in the same inning, tied the score at one. The Sooners took the lead for good in the fourth inning on a Rick Park solo home run. They would go on to win the game 4-1.

K-State head coach Mike Clark said he was pleased with the team's performance.

"I thought we played a good baseball game today," Clark said. "We did a good job of moving guys around into scoring position. We just couldn't get any hits when we needed them. Jason Wells threw well, and we played good defense. The key to the game was that they got three base hits when they had runners in scoring position and we didn't."

given night, they are not better than anybody we have played.

"I think if we had played perfectly over our head, we would still have had a hard time beating them."

In the second half, a 13-3 Texas run blew the game open.

Foul trouble plagued the Cats throughout the game. Junior center Joe Leonard and senior Tony Kitt each committed four fouls.

Asbury said fatigue was another factor the Cats were unable to overcome against Texas.

"I thought we fought and battled well. I thought we ran out of gas," Asbury said. "We got a little tired, with a lot of guys asking to come out."

The Cats will be looking to right their regular season woes this week when they open against Kansas at 2:20 p.m. Thursday in the Big 12 Conference tournament in Kansas City, Mo., at Kemper Arena. It is what K-State players are calling a new season.

"I think we are playing a lot better than we have all year, probably," Reid said. "You just never know. We will come out ready to play."

SENIORS

points. It was Reid's second straight start since returning from a broken right foot Feb. 2 against Iowa State.

Meanwhile, Kitt, a 6-foot-8-inch forward, had the tough task of defending Texas' 7-foot Chris Mihm, a Big 12 Conference Player of the Year contender. Mihm scored 17 points and grabbed seven rebounds against the Cats. Kitt recorded seven points and four rebounds and was in foul trouble for much of the night.

Reid, who missed 10 games earlier in the season, said he's been happy in Manhattan, and that he has no regrets.

"It was a little more emotional than I thought it would be for me," Reid said. "I look at my mom and dad, and we've all been talking about this since I was a little kid — it's finally over."

Reid finished his career ranked fourth in most three-point field goals made (115), third in three-pointers attempted (327), seventh in career three-point percentage (35 percent), and 15th in steals (66).

Kitt, who has been at K-State for just two seasons since transferring from Colby Community College, has established himself as one of the most prolific rebounders and shot blockers in school history.

Kitt sits sixth in career blocks with 83 and has collected 494 rebounds. This season, Kitt is third in the conference with nine boards per game. He also has recorded eight double-doubles this season, bringing his career total to 13.

"Through good and bad times, we've always stuck together," Kitt said. "That one family that we have in that locker room has always been there for each other. I wouldn't trade that for nothing."

"I love every minute that we had, win or lose. We all cried together. We all shared tears together. We all won together. For me, that experience outlasts anything."

Asbury has handled the situation like a true competitor. He is still coaching his way, but you have to wonder at what point will those involved say enough is enough? The school cannot take any more 9-18, 2-14 seasons.

We need a coach who can recruit and, above all else, direct.

If the school hires a new coach, or if Asbury is retained, we need to give him or her the necessary tools to win.

Whoever is in charge, Bramlage needs to be a fun place to go again.

New Bone Thugs-n-Harmony album should earn group another platinum record

By JUSTIN HAYWORTH
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Bone Thugs-n-Harmony's latest release, "BTNHResurrection," its fourth album, should continue its streak of consecutive platinum albums.

The 1993 debut album, "Creepin On Ah Come Up," spawned two gold singles and is certified double platinum.

The group followed that up with the 1995 release of "E. 1999 Eternal," which entered the pop and R&B album charts at No. 1. In 1996, Bone scored a Grammy Award for best rap performance by a duo or group with "The Crossroads."

The biggest hit to date for Bone was its 1997 quadruple-platinum, double-disc set, "The Art Of War," which also topped the pop and R&B charts.

"BTNHResurrection" brings back the sound of the old Bone. Heavy bass-driven beats laced with the lightning-fast lyrical flows all come together on the 16-track album.

The first track, "Show 'Em," sets the record straight on recent rumors of Bone breaking up and makes it known that the band members still are together and stronger than ever.

"Righteous Ones," the second track, starts to set the mood of the album with an eerie, dark beat and a shrill chorus wailing of "I'm waiting for the righteous one."

The next two tracks, "Two Glocks" and "Battle Zone," bring back the harsh reality of the violent streets of Cleveland that Bone members grew up on and around. "Ecstasy," the fifth track, is sure to be one of the most controversial songs on the album.

The song is all about the high achieved when taking the drug Ecstasy and the mind trips that go with it.

The next few tracks fall along the normal lyrical range for Bone with songs about Judgment Day, haters and drugs.

"Resurrection," the title track and first-released single off the album compares with "The Crossroads" and should send this single soaring up the pop and R&B charts. The message behind the song is much like Bone's last album — the world isn't the way it should be and how they wish they could change it.

The head-bopping sounds of the album continue right into the next track "Can't Give It Up." This song revolves around the premise that to get all of the things you want, you have to sacrifice. Hence the chorus, "It's always something you got to give up ... (Yeah, I know, know, know...) if you want everything you want."

The last six songs on the album are more of the same old Bone sound and subject matter, with a little deeper and sharper lyrics.

Overall, Bone brings its sound to a new level after taking close to three years off to work on solo projects and getting its Mo Thugs record label up and running. "BTNHResurrection" is consistent to Bone's other works and lives up to the hype its other albums created.

Bloodhound Gang's latest combines shock value, fun

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

"Gleefully offensive" is the first phrase that comes to mind to describe the Bloodhound Gang's latest, "Hooray for Boobies."

The title itself may be enough to drive away potential buyers, but the Bloodhound Gang's style is just too fun to pass up.

Shock value is one of this group's main needs, as the lyrics of the fifth track, "Mojo," prove — "Buggin' out like Toni Spelling's eyes/Deader than the parents on a 'Party of Five.'" If nothing else, listeners should sit with this compact disc just for its references to Pac-Man on crack and Pee-Wee Herman or its ode to porn-star Chastity Lain.

Even better is "I Hope You Die," which describes a nasty end for an anonymous enemy, involving Mack trucks hauling hazardous waste and a less-than-friendly prison cellmate named Bowling Ball Bag Bob.

With few outlets for alternative music around Manhattan, the most familiar track on the CD for K-Staters might be "The Bad Touch," often heard on KSDB-FM 91.9. Lines such as "I want you smothered/want you covered/like my Waffle House hashbrowns" are about as soft and romantic as the Gang gets on this 18-track disc.

The Gang does have problems with development, but the group revels in its lyrical problems. On track three, "Mama's Boy," lead vocalist Jimmy Pop calls his mother looking for songwriting advice.

"I'm trying to think of words that rhyme with 'vagina,'" Pop says.

"Lima? Like lima beans?" his helpful mother replies, in all seriousness.

(As heard on track four, "Three Point One Four," Pop ends up using "South Carolina" to finish the vagina stanza.)

Another problem is the group's tendency to find any bodily function whatsoever the height of hilarity. "That Cough Came with a Prize" is nothing more than the recording of a band member losing what is described as "lung mustard."

"Hooray for Boobies" is a guilty pleasure, a CD you'd be embarrassed to confess owning. I must admit to giggling like a 5-year-old when the checkout person shot me a look of disdain while ringing up my purchase. However, songs like "Hell Yeah," which includes Pop's version of what the world would be like if he were God, makes "Boobies" worth having.

Bening, Shandling disturbingly bland in lightweight new comedy

By KELLY FURNAS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

I keep waiting to see the next movies that come out with actors like Kevin Spacey and Denzel Washington. So far, at least, it looks like Oscar nominations have created a plague of poor roles for some of Hollywood's best actors and actresses.

First, it was Michael Clarke Duncan, who was superb in "The Green Mile" and then weak in "The Whole Nine Yards." Now it is Annette Bening, who was amazing in "American Beauty" and disturbingly bland in "What Planet Are You From?"

In all fairness, I have to give both credit for taking on a lighter role in a comedy after playing complex characters in Oscar-nominated dramas. Both actually acted in their latest films long before the Oscar nominations even were announced.

Nevertheless, most viewers will go to these new releases with at least some expectations, but all of them will be diminished.

In "What Planet Are You From?," Garry Shandling plays an alien from a planet of all males who comes to earth with the mission of impregnating a woman so as to create a new race of aliens that will take over the planet.

The funny part is supposed to center on the methods Shandling's character uses to get women to sleep with him. The problem is if you ever have seen a standup-comedy act — ever, by anybody — then you've already heard all of the punch lines this movie has to offer.

The jokes in this movie are so has-been and juvenile, it's amazing that a talented crop of actors (that also includes Ben Kingsley and Greg Kinnear) actually could be persuaded to mutter the lines. If this movie makes a dollar for every poor joke about the word "penis," then the "Titanic" box-office record might be broken this year. Plus, this movie is offensive to women.

Harold (Garry Shandling) adjusts to married life with wife Susan (Annette Bening) in "What Planet Are You From?"

Sometimes offensive can be funny ("South Park: Bigger Longer and Uncut"), but in this movie it just damages the supposed emotional ending. Women in this movie are slutty, or overly emotional, or just too dimwitted to realize that men only want to get them into bed. Even Bening's character, who is supposed to be one of the film's protagonists, fits more female stereotypes than perhaps any other character.

And perhaps because her role is trite, so is Bening's performance. In what's supposed to be a comedy with heart, Bening is neither funny nor moving. Shandling, who also co-wrote the film, is funny — as a standup comic is funny — but doesn't really give a memorable performance in this movie.

It actually would be more accurate not to call "What Planet Are You From?" a movie. It's just a routine.

University's interracial dating ban dropped in face of national criticism

By PAGE IVEY
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

COLUMBIA, S.C. — Bob Jones University dropped its ban on interracial dating Friday, a month after Republican presidential candidate George W. Bush's visit to the school drew widespread criticism.

"As of today, we've dropped the rule," Bob Jones III said on CNN's "Larry King Live" Friday night.

During Bush's appearance at the fundamentalist Christian school last month, the Texas governor told his audience that he shared their conservative views. Bush later apologized for failing to criticize the school's anti-Catholic views and racial policies during his visit to the Greenville campus.

"I'm pleased that they've changed the policy," Bush said Friday while campaigning in New York. "Right after my speech, I spoke out against the policy. The university has made the right decision."

Although the school started admitting black students once it lost its tax exemption in 1983 after a 13-year battle with the Internal Revenue Service that cited the school's discrimination, it banned interracial dating.

The school had defended the policy based on a biblical interpretation that God created people differently for a reason. The policy arose in the 1950s when an Asian family threatened to sue after their son, a student, almost married a white girl, a school spokesman said.

"We don't have to have that rule," Jones said. "This thing is of such insignificance to us. It's so significant to the world at large, the media in particular, why should we have this thing here as an obstacle?"

Jones said the school had a greater concern for its graduates than for keeping the rule. While extolling the virtues of the school's graduates, he said, "But now we're being defined as a racist school, that's all the media talk about."

Earlier Friday, the university used full-page newspaper advertisements in USA Today and South Carolina's largest newspapers to answer some of the national criticism directed at it.

Bush appeared at Bob Jones University shortly after he lost to Sen. John McCain in the New Hampshire primary. The South Carolina primary was looming at the time, and he went on to win in the conservative state.

After losing South Carolina, McCain's campaign made "Catholic Voter Alert" calls in the next states, Michigan and Washington, to tell them of Bush's visit to Bob Jones.

GOP candidate Alan Keyes, who recently spoke at Bob Jones University, said Friday night he thought lifting the ban was "a good step forward."

"As you know I'm married to an Indian American, so our marriage would have violated their own guidelines," he told The Associated Press in a telephone interview.

"I think this will help, so that the world will understand the real heart of Bob Jones University, and the people I met there and the people I know there. I think that's the shining truth that will come through."

Democratic presidential candidate Bill Bradley said through a spokesman: "It's about time."

The university, in the Appalachian foothills city of Greenville, has 3,500 students. It has long established itself as a bastion of fundamentalism.

Jones III, president since 1971, and his father, Bob Jones Jr., who died in 1997, have been sharp-tongued about those they believe have abandoned the strict teachings of the Bible, including Billy Graham and the pope.

Graham should not have reached out across denominations for his crusades, Jones III says. And rather than meet Pope John Paul II when he visited Columbia in 1987, Bob Jones Jr. said he would "speak to the devil himself."

His grandfather, an evangelist and son of an Alabama sharecropper, was a product of the Bible-thumping, Jim Crow-era South. Bob Jones founded the school in 1927 in College Point, Fla. He later moved it to Cleveland, Tenn., then brought it to Greenville when the Chamber of Commerce offered to buy 170 acres of land for the school.

Today, Bob Jones University offers more than 100 undergraduate majors, from electrical engineering and aviation management to Bible teaching, and 55 graduate degrees, most of those religious or musically oriented.

Leadership seminar challenges participants to change attitudes

By COURTNEY DUFFIELD
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Encouraging participants to be leaders who initiate change was the focus Friday at the fourth-annual Spirit in Leadership Seminar at the K-State Student Union, said Amy Donahy, assistant director of leadership studies and programs.

The theme of this year's seminar was "The Challenge of Change: Attitude, Accountability and Action."

The seminar was open to all faculty, staff and students.

"This particular program was to have the speakers give their personal experiences about the challenge of change, attitude, accountability and action," Jerome Frieman, professor of psychology, said.

Four presenters addressed the topic of change from their personal experiences. The presenters were Frieman, Patricia Greene, Ewing Marion Kauffman chair in entrepreneurial leadership at the University of Missouri-Kansas City; Juanita McGowan, K-State assistant professor of sociology, anthropology and social work; and Brig. Gen. Karen S. Rankin of the U.S. Air Force.

"I think the reason they asked me was I have been here for 32 years, and over that time I have been involved in a lot of leadership activities," Frieman said.

Frieman said the speakers talked about change at personal and professional levels.

He said McGowan did a good job of addressing the topic by telling audience members to have a vision and understand their strengths and weaknesses. McGowan also addressed how to change curriculum in order to make students more aware of diversity and how important it has become in the business world.

Four respondents asked the speakers questions after their presentations.

Frieman said the respondents helped the presenters draw a connection between their speeches. He said it helped combine their four different approaches to the topic.

"I think it got us to focus on on things," Frieman said.

The luncheon speaker was Donita Whitney-Bammerlin, instructor of management.

"I started mine with the whole point of being successful and how in society, we tend to determine success by how much money we make, what cars we drive, etc.," Whitney-Bammerlin said.

"I talked about building your strengths and how we measure leadership."

Whitney-Bammerlin also said people need to learn how to grow with change.

"Almost all of the time, if you are not in the state of growth, you are in the state of decay because change is inevitable," Whitney-Bammerlin said.

Boeing to impose contract offer

By MIKE WELLS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SEATTLE — The Boeing Co. declared Sunday it will impose its most recent contract offer on engineers and technical workers whose union has been on strike against the aerospace giant for 3 1/2 weeks.

"Now it's time to get back to work and start focusing on our customers," said Alan Mulally, president of the Boeing Commercial Airplane Group, at a news conference Sunday afternoon.

The union for 17,000 striking workers dismissed the action as an attempt to get workers to cross picket lines and called it an unfair labor practice.

"We're not coming back until they sit down at the table with us and negotiate this contract," said Tom McCarty, a member of the engineering negotiating team, who was picketing with about 75 other Boeing employees outside the news conference.

Boeing officials said employees will receive pay raises today specified for the first year of the company's Feb. 26 contract offer.

Technical workers will get a guaranteed minimum 2-percent wage increase, with a pool representing a 3-percent additional increase to be doled out selectively.

The contract offer does not guarantee engineers an increase in the first year. Performance-based raises will be granted from a fund, totaling a 5-percent increase, with another 1 percent for those about to be promoted.

An additional 2-percent increase was set aside for engineers in critical skills areas such as software development and electrical engineering, Boeing spokesman Peter Conte said.

"We are implementing the last, best offer we made to our team because it's time to move forward," Mulally said.

The company will not impose other parts of the offer, however, including reductions in life insurance benefits and some changes in health insurance.

Phyllis Rogers, general counsel for the Society of Professional Engineering Employees in Aerospace, said the union will file an unfair labor practice charge with the National Labor Relations Board.

"We believe it's a move on Boeing's part to try and get employees to cross the picket line and we believe it's going to be monumentally unsuccessful," she said Sunday afternoon.

Boeing declared an impasse Wednesday in contract talks as the strike entered its fourth week.

Negotiations had broken down Feb. 27 between the company and the Society of Professional Engineering Employees in Aerospace despite the efforts of C. Richard Barnes, head of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, and other federal mediators.

contributors along with their expenditure reports.

Morgan said one presidential ticket, Drew Maenche and Ali Karimi, still has not turned in an expenditure report.

Maenche said the pair forgot about it and will submit it by Monday.

"We were out handing out fliers on Friday afternoon, and we just forgot to turn it in," Maenche said.

However, he said he didn't think the oversight hurt their campaign because they spent very little money.

"We're grassroots," he said. "All we bought was paper. We stuck by what we said. We only spent $11."

The committee still is in the process of verifying contributions to presidential tickets.

"We randomly select contributors and call them to verify that the information candidates provided is correct," he said.

Things look good for now, Morgan said, but the committee's investigation into expenditures will be ongoing.

"If someone calls in a complaint that says someone spent more than they said they did, we will definitely look into that."

"This will be a continuous process for the next few days," he said. "It could even go on past elections."

Who didn't turn in an expense report?

The following Student Governing Association elections candidates failed to turn in an expense report. Unless they submit one by Tuesday, they will be ineligible to hold an office if elected.

people," Nichols said. "Our buyers evaluate bulls by looking at performance data and pedigrees, and visually appraising the cattle."

The sale also helps students learn leadership skills, he said.

"The students are responsible for different aspects of the sale,"

Nichols said. "It is a great combination of learning how to manage a sale and gives a marketing tool for the school's herd."

K-State maintains a high-quality herd used for teaching and research projects. The money made from the sale goes back into general department operations, he said.

Buyers for the sale usually come from within a 150-mile radius of Manhattan, Nichols said.

The sale is supported by a common group of buyers who come back every year, said Scott Schaake, associate professor of animal sciences and industry. He said 70 percent are repeat buyers.

"The sale is definitely a group effort and a great hands-on experience for students," Schaake said. "It doesn't happen without the help and support of Dr. Riley, Dean Johnson and the students. It's a lot of grunt work, but it's well worth it."

This year's sale will be evaluated by the class, and changes will be made for next year's class, Nichols said.

"The kids have put a lot of time into it," he said. "They learn by doing."

how the degree-auditing process works. Each set of requirements is listed by category and marked as either "no," "IP" or "OK."

"No" means the requirements are not fulfilled yet, "IP" means the requirements will be completed at the end of the current semester when the classes in progress are passed, and "OK" means the requirements are completed.

For requirements that have not been completed, lists of courses that meet the requirement also are listed.

Other information listed includes current grade point average, transfer courses and K-State equivalents.

"We hope this will make advising go smoother for the student," Woodard said. "The student can begin planning a schedule before meeting with an adviser, and that will help them when they go into their advising session."

Woodard said students should use DARS as a tool to help them meet with advisers and plan schedules, not as a substitute for the advising process.

"This isn't an official document, these reports," Woodard said. "The advising is still needed to guide students toward a degree. This just makes advising go a bit more smoothly."

Katherine Shields, senior in elementary education, said DARS might be an invaluable tool for students like her.

"I'm considering a change in curriculum, so these listings can only help me decide which courses to take," Shields said. "I especially like the way it shows which classes you can take to fulfill a degree requirement. It makes choosing a class much easier."

Woodard said she hopes every student makes an effort to use the system.

"We hope it becomes popular," she said. "By introducing the system just before enrollment, we hope students are incited to try the system out."

Woodard also said if students have any technical problems with the system, they need to go to the registrar's office. For academic problems, Woodard recommends students meet with their academic deans.

VOTE ONLINE

Students can cast ballots online through KATS 24 hours a day until 6 p.m. Wednesday.

By DANEDRI THOMPSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Polls for Student Governing Association elections open at 8 a.m. today, and Travis Morgan, Student Senate election chair, said he hopes more than 12-15 percent of the student body will vote.

He said that's typically the percentage of students who cast ballots, and he thinks that's a problem.

"You have a better chance of pulling two cards out of a deck and getting the cards that someone guesses than you do of going up to two students on our campus and having them tell you they voted in the last election," he said.

That's one reason students won't find polling booths in the same four places they found them in last year's elections, he said. Students now can vote at any computer with Internet access.

Morgan said he hopes online voting will get more people to the polls.

"I think it's going to allow people who wouldn't normally have voted to be represented," he said.

He said students can cast ballots online through KATS for student body president and vice president, college councils, the Fine Arts Council, Union Governing Board and student senators 24 hours a day from 8 a.m. today until 6 p.m. Wednesday.

"It looks really neat the way the system is going to work here," he said. "I got to log on to KATS and make sure I was going to be able to vote. Just seeing some of the stuff come to life is pretty cool."

However, he said online voting isn't the only reason he expects to see an increase in numbers this year. K-State-Salina will cast ballots for student body president for the first time as well.

"It's going to be even easier for them," he said. "They'll probably have a greater percentage turnout."

But he said he didn't know for sure what effect Salina would have on the election.

"That's going to be a great question," he said. "Because we've never done it before."

He said he hopes people in general will take advantage of the ease of voting.

"If they want their voices to be heard and they want their side to be represented, they need to get out there vote for who they believe is going to do a good job, take their ideas and put them in to practice," he said.

Jenny Scheer, junior in dietetics, said she has been paying attention to the issues and will vote.

"I care about what changes are made to our campus," she said.

Nathan Watkins, freshman in open-option, said he also cares about campus and plans to vote.

"I like to see the people that share similar ideas put into office," he said.

One of these is their concern for minority involvement in Student Senate.

recent tuition hike.

"If the tuition is going to raise, I think there definitely needs to be a rise in financial aid," Brooks said. "Since we've been here the tuition really hasn't risen so comparatively that it's not affordable, but if you're taking 15 to 20 hours, that's going to increase the amount you need to pay by quite a bit."

If elected, they said they hope to change that.

In addition to lobbying for a financial aid increase to parallel the tuition hike, Brooks and Miller are pushing for a fall break, calling for students to get Monday and Tuesday off instead of Wednesday during Thanksgiving break.

They said they believe students need nine days instead of five to relax.

Brooks said one option for fall break is to begin school on Wednesday instead of Thursday or to begin school two days earlier than normal.

they support a citywide transit system, they prefer to focus on the immediate problem.

Metzinger and Claeys said they're looking to alumni donors for financing and prefer a funding solution that doesn't involve students except for a minimum maintenance fee.

The other three issues they want to address include a privilege-fee review to keep costs down, expanding KATS services and adding more lighting and crosswalk systems.

"A poll on the KATS system could be a good way for SGA to communicate with students better," Gunter said.

Another problem pertinent to them is installing push and pull signs on the front doors of Cardwell Hall.

Gunter and Kelso also have some ideas on how Student Governing Association the campus.

The first of three main platform issues on which Hall and Hoskinson have chosen to concentrate is that of student advising.

Hall said the need for accountability among faculty advisers would lessen the chance of students being left behind by the system.

A second platform issue for the pair's campaign, graduate teaching assistants, focuses on the GTAs' role in the classroom. Hoskinson said GTAs fresh to teaching encounter interaction problems, and find it hard to communicate with their students.

Educational funding is the third platform item addressed by the Hall and Hoskinson campaign. With student voices involved in government at the state level, further increases in tuition could perhaps be avoided, Hall said.

Hall said he would suggest a forum to provide what he and Hoskinson feel is the most important part of K-State government: student voices.

students."

Their platform includes legitimate concerns for campus — not far-fetched ideas, such as banning smoking, they said.

Tuition increases affect all students, Maenche said. As tuition is increased, there should be more progress. Instead, programs are being cut, organizations are not receiving funds and some people are getting pay raises when the money could be used elsewhere.

A mass-transit system for students is another of the pair's main concerns. A parking garage would not solve the parking problem, Maenche said. The garage only is a short-term fix for a long-term problem, and K-State will continue to have record enrollments in the future, he said.

Maenche said Hale Library needs tremendous improvements as well. Students and faculty are not able to obtain the resources for their research or personal needs, he said. Many students have complained about the lack of books, resources and journals they need, but are unable to find in Hale.

tions on campus to find answers to difficult problems.

McCurry, senior in agricultural journalism, and Heller, junior in agronomy, support creating a fall rally on campus. The rally would recognize the student body president, student awards, faculty accomplishments, the football team, President Jon Wefald, Coach Bill Snyder and the Manhattan mayor.

The candidates also support a hotline that could be used to elicit student ideas and opinions.

In addition to a hotline, McCurry and Heller want Student Senate to hit the airwaves. They want to explore the possibility of Senate broadcast live over cable channel eight.

McCurry said he even would explore the possibility of students being able to call in.

McCurry said he would like to see events like Landon Lectures, other speakers and a monthly president's question session with live call-in questions broadcast on Channel 8 as well.

want to ease the pain of the harder ones that the majority of students have difficulties with," said Teach, student body presidential candidate and junior in public relations.

He said an increasing concern is the qualification of graduate teaching assistants. Teach and Burkin said the situation can be helped by looking at GTAs individually and creating some type of test.

Tuition is another concern, they said, but not as highly ranked as the others.

"We know that we can't solve the tuition problem in just a year," Teach said. "Perhaps, though, by trying to do something about it, we can help future students."

He said lighting and the issue of campus safety is an original part of their campaign.

The pair also said parking is a continuing problem.

"Lines of cars wait for the next person to pull out of their parking spot so they can grab the spot before everyone else," said Burkin, junior in human resource management and marketing.

him back to the campaign trail. Wooten said the city is being led to think that the resolution has the support of most K-State students. If it did, he said, at least one bar would prohibit smoking.

This year, Wooten and Shea's platform includes new issues like rejection of a citywide smoking ban and tighter spending limits on campaigns for student government, in addition to last year's moves for campus beautification and the removal of men's basketball coach Tom Asbury.

With campaign finance, Shea, vice presidential candidate and senior in secondary education, said lower spending limits would even the playing field and allow a more diverse group of students to run for office.

For campus beautification, the running mates said they'd like to pursue goals like a fountain and seating area between the K-State Student Union and Seaton Hall.

In the meantime, Shea said the two are looking at campaign concepts to let people know they are genuine and very available to the student body.

system that would allow access to online library resources from off-campus and residence hall computers. They also want to expand the services of KATS, including being able to request transcripts through KATS instead of having to go to the Registrar's Office and paying $5.

Another technology improvement Worcester and Pracht would like to see happen is increased computer lab access and laser printers in campus labs rather than dot matrix printers.

The last area Worcester and Pracht want to focus on is student life.

They are interested in adding a Student Activity Center to the K-State Student Union that would house the Student Governing Association, Greek Affairs, multicultural organizations, Union Program Council and any other student organizations. They said a Student Activity Center would provide interaction between all student organizations rather than separating the groups across campus.

PRESIDENT & VICE PRESIDENT

The student body president serves as the chief executive for the Student Governing Association.

The president's responsibilities include voicing problems and concerns of the K-State student body to Faculty Senate, the Kansas Board of Regents and the Legislature.

"Part of my job in being a liaison for the campus is being a catalyst for the students," Student Body President Jason Heinrich said.

The president meets with the regents once a month in Topeka.

Other presidential duties include traveling, attending speaking engagements, participating in fund-raisers, attending administrative meetings and functions, appointing students to different committees and attending various meetings.

The president also has the power to veto bills and resolutions passed by Student Senate.

The vice president has the second-highest position in Student Senate.

The vice president serves as chief executive of SGA if the president is unable to fulfill his or her duties, whether because of illness or resigning. The vice president also is the chair of the Educational Opportunity Fund Committee.

The vice president oversees and coordinates special SGA projects and programs, assists the president in appointing cabinet members and serves as liaison between the vice president of institutional advancement and SGA.

STUDENT SENATE

Student Senate is the legislative body and voice for K-State students.

Senate consists of 60 representatives, and each person represents each individual college.

Two faculty members also serve on Student Senate, while three students serve on Faculty Senate.

Standing committees are also a part of Student Senate. Committees include the Operations Committee, which tallies senator absences and makes sure Senate runs smoothly; the Academic Affairs and University Relations Committee, which is responsible for all academic issues on campus; the Student Affairs and Social Services committee, which deals with issues pertaining to student life, student representation and services; the Governmental Relations Committee, which lobbies state and local governments to address student concerns; and the Communications Committee, which serves as a Senate public relations group.

They allocate funds to student groups and services, such as Lafene Health Center and the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, through the privilege fees.

Student Senate writes legislation, looks over recommendations and maintains contact with the Kansas Board of Regents.

Senators also enact policies for the student body, charter college councils and committees of Student Senate and define and establish the Student Conduct Code.

BOARD OF STUDENT PUB

The Board of Student Publications oversees the policies and issues of all student publications.

Five elected members, two faculty members, the director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications, and representatives from the Royal Purple, the Collegian and the Student Publications Advertising Department make up the board.

The board hires editors in chief for the Collegian and for the RP. They also hire the advertising sales manager for both publications on a semester basis.

The board also manages finances for the Collegian and RP and approves the budget.

UNION GOVERNING BOARD

The Union Governing Board focuses on issues that concern the K-State Student Union.

UGB has 15 voting members. It is composed of 12 students and three faculty members. Five of the positions are up for election. Non-elected members are appointed by the student body president, Student Alumni Board, Student Senate and other organizations.

UGB decides whether something follows policy or goes against it. It deals with overall things occurring at the Union. Fiscal issues also are handled by UGB and reviewed annually.

Recently, the main issue has been Union renovations.

FINE ARTS COUNCIL

The Fine Arts Council gives money to fine arts departments when they need or request funds.

It also allocates money to fine arts student groups such as the Potter's Guild. Each semester, Student groups must submit an application in order to receive funding.

There is a set budget for the recipients, which include the departments of Music; Art; Speech Communication, Theatre and Dance; and English, as well as McCain Auditorium.

From the nearly $381,000 budget, the council then has $12,000 extra to allocate.

"McCain Auditorium receives $94,000 a year, which is the reason for the student prices being cheaper," said Jeremy Lutz, Union Governing Board president.

Nine students serve on the council, five of whom are elected by the student body, and eight faculty members represent the departments. Four of the students are appointed by Senate and two are appointed by the student body president.

The appointed members serve on the council for one year. Two of the elected members serve two-year terms, while the other three elected to the council serve one-year terms.

Outdated browsers cause voting problems

By NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students using campus computers to vote online during the first day of Student Governing Association elections might have encountered some difficulty.

Travis Morgan, Student Senate elections chair, said the problem lies in K-State's version of Netscape, which is not new enough for the online voting software, votehere.net.

"They have a Netscape version that is 4.05, which is archaic. The cut-off is 4.08," Morgan said. "That is causing people not to be able to vote online."

Peter Adlerburg, director of business development for votehere.net, said K-State's browser would not work because it didn't support the security necessary for voting.

"There's just way too many security holes to support online voting," he said.

He said not having the browser updated was just one of the smaller things that slipped through the cracks.

"It was an unfortunate oversight. We just kind of assumed that the newest browser would be there," Adlerburg said. "Luckily, students can still vote from other computers with a supportive browser. It's just kind of unfortunate."

Morgan said the university didn't realize it was a problem until early Monday morning.

"No one would have guessed we didn't have a browser that high," he said. "This is a university. We should have the technology to do these things."

Adlerburg said the process so far had been an overall success despite the problems. He said K-State was the first university to use their kind of software, which provides more security than other online voting programs.

"K-State is making history with this," he said. "It is the first school to use a truly secure, non-trusted authority system. That means there's no chance for voter fraud."

The implementation of the new browser, along with other upgrades and additions, was scheduled to be updated at the beginning of the spring semester, said Chuck Gould, systems associate at Computing and Network Services.

Due to technical difficulties and other obstacles encountered, he said, the updated release for the campus computers missed the scheduled date.

"We just didn't get it done on time," he said. "Our goal is to implement it as soon as possible."

Gould said CNS was not aware that the new online voting needed an updated browser, and that options on Web sites for free upgrades were not always an option for systems like K-State's.

"It is possible for people to develop things and make them available to the community, but the people with the access points may not have been consulted," Gould said. "The process of updating our software is much more difficult than updating desktop computers."

He said the problem could have been prevented had the communication between CNS and the developers of the program been better.

"It's unfortunate," he said. "But in fast-paced technology, sometimes one group gets ahead of another."

Morgan said they didn't expect to have a problem with the browser, but some problems were bound to surface.

"This is a new process," Morgan said. "You have to expect a few bugs. It'll just be an inconvenience."

Election Committee meeting today to discuss possible funding violation

By DANEDRI THOMPSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jeremy Claeys, student body presidential candidate, said his campaign is not guilty of a contribution report inaccuracy, but he'll have to present his side to the Student Senate Elections Committee this morning.

Claeys and running mate Amy Metzinger pleaded not guilty to an inaccurate contribution report violation on Monday.

"We pleaded not guilty to a violation regarding our expenditure report," he said. "It states that we reported contributions for an individual who did not actually contribute."

Claeys said he and Metzinger entered the not guilty plea so they could review the allegation. He said he spoke to an individual who bought a T-shirt who didn't realize the purchase was a contribution to the Claeys/Metzinger campaign.

"I'm guessing that's where the problem occurred," he said. "I think that's more the case of an individual not understanding what the contribution meant."

Regardless of the outcome of the hearing, Claeys said he wants to see if they made a mistake.

"I can't say for sure that we're not guilty, but we want to find out for sure," he said. "I would hate to simply plead no contest or not guilty if it really was a mistake on the part of our donors not understanding the process."

The Claeys ticket wasn't the only ticket in which the committee found discrepancies with expenditure reports.

The committee fined the Steve Hall/

Professor opens conservatory to help others learn about, enjoy

BUTTERFLIES

BY KELLY EVENSON

As he was standing in the middle of a rain forest in Costa Rica, Sonny Ramaswamy, professor and head of the Department of Entomology, had an idea — to open a butterfly conservatory at K-State.

"I saw all of the butterflies in this beautiful rainforest, and it occurred to me that what the prairie needed was a butterfly house with gorgeous butterflies for people to see," Ramaswamy said. "I came back and talked with some department heads, and everyone loved the idea."

Housed in a Victorian-era conservatory built in the early 1900s, the butterfly conservatory allows students, faculty and those in the community an opportunity to see butterflies and plants in both a tropical and desert settings, Ralph Charlton, associate professor of entomology, said.

"It is a completely free-flying environment," Charlton said. "People can immerse themselves in the experience and watch as butterflies pass freely anywhere in the infrastructure."

Charlton said the conservatory, which is a joint project with the Department of Horticultural, Forestry and Recreation Resources, was built to be an education outreach for the campus and the community. He said butterflies are popular, and a number of facilities have been built throughout the United States as places to visit and study butterflies.

"We are providing a place for people to go to learn about insects and plant and insect interactions," Charlton said. "It is all about an idea of being transported into a different world and seeing these beautiful insects. People are very intrigued by that."

Charlton said in the two months the conservatory was opened last fall, at least 3,000 people came to visit. He said many were school groups, but there were also many students and community members that came to enjoy the atmosphere.

The conservatory reopened March 1 after being closed for a few months for maintenance.

"You can become so enamored with the butterflies," Charlton said. "It has an aesthetic benefit, and especially in the middle of winter, it is nice to have a place to visit with lush life when it is so bleak outside."

Ramaswamy said another benefit to the conservatory is the environmental protection and preservation it offers to insects in the building.

"By visiting the conservatory, it brings to people's minds that the tropics are being devastated every second," Ramaswamy said. "If we don't start doing something now, there will not be anything left for our children and grandchildren."

Charlton said at any given time, there are 200-300 butterflies in the conservatory. Before it opened, however, he said federal permits had to be obtained for any insect that was not native to Kansas.

"Anything that was not raised here needed permits," Charlton said. "The state has such a broad sense of protection for its main economy, agriculture, that anything that was not bred and native to Kansas had to have a permit."

Ramaswamy said not many people know of the conservatory, although it was successful in its first few months. He said the environment is a great place for a picnic or to go spend time with friends.

"Butterflies are a thing of beauty," Ramaswamy said. "Insects are the most gorgeous creatures on earth, and being around them can be very soothing."

Funding for the conservatory comes from the Department of Entomology budget and private donors.

However, because funding was approved from the City/University Tax Fund, the butterfly conservatory will receive $27,000 for its 2001 operating budget.

Charlton said the money will be used for basic maintenance and care of the butterflies, educational materials, the purchase of more butterflies from Costa Rica, the Philippines and the United States and touch-screen computers that will allow visitors to obtain information about individual insects and plants.

"The opportunity for education is a wide spectrum," Charlton said. "We offer hands-on demonstrations, and it allows people to become attuned to the plants and be transported from their regular surroundings."

Ramaswamy said the conservatory was dedicated Oct. 8, 1999, the day before the K-State vs. KU football game.

The conservatory is located on Denison Avenue next to the University Gardens. It is open from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. on weekdays and 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. on weekends free of charge.

Charlton said after the conclusion of the spring semester, hours will be extended.

"People like to get into nature," Charlton said. "This offers them the opportunity to do so without having to take a walk through the woods."

Hall plans to enroll, play in fall

By DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Joe Hall still is not a student at K-State, nor has he notified the university that he will be enrolling for the upcoming fall semester.

An official at the registrar's office confirmed that no new information has arisen regarding Hall's educational status.

However, when reached at his Manhattan home Monday, Hall said he was planning to enroll for the fall 2000 semester and would play football for K-State next season.

According to K-State Sports Information Director Kent Brown, Hall's standing at K-State has remained the same since January, when Wildcat head football coach Bill Snyder issued a statement about the situation through Brown.

"Joe is presently not enrolled in classes at Kansas State University," Snyder said, "and is considering options regarding the continuation of his education."

Since then, Brown said Hall's status as a player has not changed, either.

"You have to be a student at Kansas State University to be on the football team, and right now he is not a student at Kansas State," Brown said.

In regards to whether Hall is working out with the team, Brown said, "I don't know what his status is at this point."

However, Hall said that he indeed was working out with the squad and has made the decision to remain at K-State.

Hall was the Wildcats' leading rusher in 1999 with 653 yards on 132 carries and six touchdowns.

With three consecutive 100-yard games against Utah State, Oklahoma State and Baylor, the 6-foot-2-inch, 290 pound junior running back became the first K-State player to accomplish such a feat since J.J. Smith in 1994.

Group must pay for K-State name

■ Profits from sale of T-shirts cost English department in royalty fees.

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The fee came as a surprise to the Department of English this year.

Donna Potts, assistant professor of English, said she had just found out that K-State was requiring them to pay for the privilege of using the name "Kansas State University" on T-shirts being made for the cultural studies symposium.

"This is the first year it's been an issue, but it will be an issue in the future for sure," Potts said.

However, John Fairman, K-State's director of licensing, said the university started charging a royalty fee for anyone using their name in 1982. The only exception is if an organization is making T-shirts for its members and is not selling them.

Potts said she did not know this. "Maybe this is the first time that they've specifically said that you've got to pay fees for using 'Kansas State University,'" she said. "I think that

Nude woman with scissors escorted out of Statehouse

TOPEKA — A nude woman holding scissors tried to enter the office of Gov. Bill Graves.

The Topeka woman entered a reception area that leads to Graves' office around 11 a.m. Monday, said John Eichkorn, spokesman for the Kansas Highway Patrol.

Eichkorn said a Capitol Police officer and a Highway Patrol trooper took the scissors away from the woman, who did not struggle or try to hurt anyone. He said the officers then handcuffed her.

The officers found a tablecloth to cover the woman, then escorted her out of the Statehouse, Eichkorn said.

She now is in the Shawnee County Jail. No formal charges have been filed.

Radio-conglomerate merger prompts sale of 72 stations

SAN ANTONIO — Clear Channel Communications Inc., the nation's largest radio company, announced plans Monday to sell 72 stations in connection with its pending acquisition of AMFM Inc.

The divestiture of stations is aimed at allaying potential antitrust objections to the pending merger.

Clear Channel announced in October that it planned to buy AMFM, the nation's second-largest radio empire, for about $16.6 billion in stock. Executives said they planned to sell 125 radio stations worth about $4.2 billion to head off antitrust concerns from regulators and consumer groups.

The proposed station sales are subject to regulatory approval and are contingent upon the closing of the merger, Clear Channel said in a statement.

While Clear Channel did not provide purchase prices for each of the proposed sales, Cox Radio Inc. said it was paying $380 million for seven stations — four in Richmond, Va., and three in Houston. Infinity Broadcasting said it is paying $1.4 billion for the 18 stations it is buying.

A spokeswoman for Clear Channel did not return a telephone call from The Associated Press.

The pending merger between Clear Channel and AMFM would create a radio company that would dominate the airwaves nationwide with more than 800 stations.

Man challenges authority of judge in spouse's trial

TOPEKA — A man who claims to be the state's legitimate governor was arrested Monday after challenging the authority of a judge who is presiding over his wife's trial.

Mark Drake was arrested in Shawnee County District Court after confronting District Judge Matthew Dowd, who is overseeing the trial of Paula Drake.

She is charged with having an illegal Statehouse meeting. Mark Drake was convicted of the same misdemeanor charge July 14.

The Drakes were charged because they did not have a permit when Mark Drake was sworn in as "de jure" governor on Jan. 11, 1999, shortly after Gov. Bill Graves was inaugurated for his second term.

The Drakes say that Graves and other officials did not take their oaths properly or correctly certify election results, whereas Mark Drake followed the proper procedure in those matters.

As soon as Dowd entered the courtroom Monday, Mark Drake walked from the spectator area to Dowd's bench.

"I have a cease and desist order, and I'm going to read it to you," Mark Drake said.

"No you won't," responded Dowd, who ordered a court employee to call security.

Mark Drake proceeded to read a document that said District Judge Franklin Theis, who had a pretrial hearing Feb. 16, had not transferred the case to Dowd.

After Mark Drake finished reading, a Shawnee County sheriff's deputy arrived. He escorted Mark Drake out of the courtroom and arrested him for criminal trespassing and obstruction of legal process, which are misdemeanors.

Mark Drake is in the Shawnee County Jail. After being arrested last year on the illegal meeting charges, Mark Drake spent 44 days in jail, while his wife spent 46 days.

Internship offerings. Deborah Madden, senior in public relations, said she left two days after finals to begin working in Disney World's Animal Kingdom.

As part of her job, she said she was in charge of driving a Kilimanjaro truck, which took guests of the famous theme park through an animal reserve of East Africa.

The reason for her experiences in Disney World — an internship opportunity.

Mary Marston, assistant director of Career and Employment Services, said it is crucial for students to have an internship because of the career-related experience it gives them before entering the work force.

"It is always a good idea for students to have an internship because many employers want their potential employees to have some related experience," Marston said.

"It gives them practical experience that they will need later on," he said.

Marston said there will be an internship workshop in the K-State Student Union Staterooms.

She said the workshop will offer advice about how to get an internship, where to search for one and why it is important to have one during the summer, fall or spring semesters.

"Students can gain experience that they wouldn't get in class, as well as learn how to network with others in their field," Marston said. "They can also gain the confidence from knowing they can do something and do it well in their career profession."

Marston also said students registered with Career and Employment Services can search for jobs online by placing their resumes on the Web site.

Students must fill out a form at the Career and Employment Services office in Holtz Hall.

Students pay a registration fee of $20 before becoming eligible to use the service.

Madden said the opportunity she had interned with Disney World was valuable because she received the experience needed to deal with people and work with others from around the world.

"It helped me gain a sense of how to deal with all kinds of people," Madden said. "I learned how to treat everyone with respect, and it gave me permanent experience I will need later in my career."

Students produce wax hand molds, candle art at event sponsored by UPC

By REED DUNN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Marcella Burks said she had her hands stuck together for about 15 minutes.

Burks, senior in psychology, said she decided to take part in the Wax Hands and Candle Art event at the K-State Student Union on Monday afternoon because it was something fun to do between classes. The Union Program Council Special Events Committee sponsored Wax 'n More of Dallas to give students a chance to make a wax mold of their hands or create a decorative candle for free.

Burks was one of many students who took advantage of the activity and created a hand mold. After cooling her hands by sticking them into a cooler of ice water, Burks began a series of four dips into melted paraffin to create the mold. By the time she did her third dip, she said she could not feel the temperature.

"The first time it was a hot burning," Burks said. "Now it's just like a numbing."

By placing her hands on top of each other and pointing her thumbs outward, Burks formed a mold similar to the Alpha Kappa Alpha sign. She said she did not see much use for the mold, but thought she could put it up for decoration.

"I have a display of my sorority things," Burks said. "I will probably put it with those."

After a successful turnout at last year's wax hand and candle event, Claire Mohlman, UPC Special Events Committee chairwoman and sophomore in history, said it only made sense to bring the event back to K-State.

"It was a huge success last year," she said. "Students had a lot of fun, so we decided to bring it back."

Katie Wiens, junior in psychology, said she saw the event set up last year but was not able to take advantage of it. After taking time to make one candle Monday

JUSTIN HAYWORTH COLLEGIAN

Kaylene Kramp, junior in psychology, waits in line to have a wax mold of her hand cut off as Brandon Anderson of Wax 'n More from Dallas, dips a wax mold into color dye Monday afternoon in the K-State Student Union. Anderson said they probably did about 200 wax hand molds and 180 candles from 11 a.m. to 5 p.m.

morning, she said she returned to get another chance at creating the artwork.

"I saw them last year but didn't have time to make one," she said. "I made one earlier, so I came back because I just loved it."

Brandon Anderson, Wax 'n More employee, said groups from the company travel around the country to college campuses and conventions for a variety of shows and events. He said much of the attraction is to the hand molds, but the company has other options for event coordinators.

"I'd say 90 percent of our show are at college campuses," he said. "We also have inflatable games, laser tag and a velcro wall."

Anderson has been with the company for about a year and a half and said he enjoys meeting people at the different shows. He said since he has worked with Wax 'n More, he has been to every state except Maine, North Dakota and Washington.

"Getting to meet people and travel around makes this job worth it," he said. "Once you've been with it for a while you start going back to the same places and seeing the same people."

Anderson said praying hands are one of the most popular molds students create. He said the California salute and the sign language symbol for "I love you" are also popular.

Evelyn Wray, graduate student in continuing education, chose to make praying hands. She had the mold dyed purple, because she said purple praying hands just make sense.

"I have my hands like this because I pray that I don't flunk out," she said.

When she first dipped her hands into the ice water, Wray had a difficult time keeping them immersed for the required five seconds. Once she dipped her hands into the wax, she said the cold seemed like nothing and it was hard to keep her hands together between dips into the paraffin.

"I like the extreme," she said. "It went from extreme cold to extreme hot. Now it just feels constricting."

The hand mold and candle event was as successful this year as last, Mohlman said.

"As long as we had it there, people were waiting in line," she said. "It's just sort of a novelty. You can't get wax hands anywhere."

Students could win $100 for going to UPC events

By MIKE SHEPHERD
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

People are excited about collecting eight stickers to possibly win $100, said Aaron Setton, Union Program Council Outdoors/Adventures committee chairman and sophomore in music.

For attending eight UPC events, students can have their names put in a drawing scheduled for May 3.

Three winners will receive $100 each.

At each event, a sticker is placed on a business card. When eight stickers are collected, the cards can be dropped off in the UPC office on the third floor of the Union.

Just getting eight stickers does not mean participants will win automatically.

Three entries will be drawn after the deadline.

"You can fill up as many as you can, but you can only win once," Heidi McBride, UPC program adviser said.

The incentive program, started this semester, is an effort to boost attendance at UPC events, said Matt Hupp, UPC Promotions committee chairman and junior in business management.

"We figured money was a good way," he said.

Hupp said they haven't seen a big increase in attendance yet but said that will change as time passes.

He said it will take a while for news of the program to spread throughout campus.

The UPC attendance goal doesn't have a set number of attendees members would like to have at each event.

"We'd like to fill the room up, but that depends on the room and the event," McBride said. "If it's in Forum Hall, we'd like to have 600 people."

An events calendar, available at the UPC office, has regular events including movies, comedians and concerts scheduled during the semester.

McBride said it is easy to fill up a card by attending three week's worth of events, most of which are free.

"A couple of people only have one left to get," she said.

Military ball to promote cohesion within different ROTC programs

By MIKE SHEPHERD
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State ROTC social event of the year is less than a week away.

Instead of each branch having its own event, both the Air Force and Army ROTC units will team up for a military ball on Friday in the K-State Student Union Ballroom.

"The purpose is to promote cohesion within the program and to practice military customs and courtesies," Cathy Winter, Army ROTC cadet captain, said. "Everyone gets in their best uniforms."

There will be a social hour beginning at 6 p.m. and a dinner at 7. Following the dinner will be a ceremony to honor POW-MIA victims, presentation of the colors and a guest speaker.

After the formal event is over, there will be a dance, which will last until midnight.

"Some functions in the military are for cadets only, but in this case, cadets are encouraged to bring their spouses or sweethearts," Winter said.

This also will be a chance for cadets of both branches to spend time together.

"It will be fun to spend time together. I'm always with Air Force cadets, never with the Army," said Christina Hoggatt, Air Force ROTC cadet captain and services commander.

"We all know each other, but we have our own classes and labs," she said.

Throughout the past year, considerable fund-raising efforts have been made by the cadets, Winter said.

Cadets have worked as ushers at football games, security at Bramlage Coliseum for basketball games and the recent "M*A*S*H" tribute, where cadets teamed up with the Union for a cookout.

"It's safe to say we've had to raise over $2,000 for this event," Winter said.

At the same time, a considerable amount of time went into planning the event, Hoggatt said.

"When you plan a big party like this, there's a lot of little things that need to be taken care of," she said.

Hoggatt said her duties include making sure everyone has a place to sit and that everyone is served the meal they request.

"It's an equal thing," she said. "Give Army some credit, too."

Unlike other campus events, Winter said the military ball will not have a theme.

"That's what sets us apart from other campus organizations," Winter said. "We don't have particular colors to go with a particular theme."

Voting problems display lack of foresight

Computing and Network Services and the Student Senate Elections Committee need to get on the same wavelength. Because of the failure of the two parties to communicate, problems have arisen with the online voting process. The problem stems from the fact that CNS did not update Web browsers in several computer labs on campus. This is the result of a scheduling conflict and because CNS was not told an updated browser was essential to the online voting process. Because there are old versions of Netscape in computer labs on campus — including several of the bigger labs — students who attempt to cast their online ballots are unable to do so. They either must seek out a computer that does have the updated software or go to the voting center in the K-State Student Union. While this is not an absurd inconvenience for students, it certainly is an unnecessary one. A little research by committee members and communication between the committee and CNS could have alleviated the problem. Instead, voters — already apathetic year after year — have been given one more hindrance that lessens the likelihood they will vote. The elections committee does put forth a genuine effort to increase voter turnout, but oversights like this will likely eliminate any potential gains.

The move to online voting is a step in the right direction for elections, but now the committee needs to follow through. Problems like this bode poorly for what the future might hold for online balloting. In the future, the elections committee needs to have foresight, not similar oversights.

Reader says car racing deserves sport status

Editor,
I have a few points to make about Jon Balmer's Feb. 25 column about racing and Nascar. He is right about technology playing a big part in racing today. But in Nascar's case, certain areas of technology have not entered its way into stock cars. Stock cars are powered by an overhead-valve V8 engine that breathes through a carburetor with the power transferred through a four-speed manual transmission connected to live rear axle — all 1950s technology at best. Whether auto racing is a sport or not, ponder this: Ernest Hemingway said bull fighting, mountain climbing and auto racing are sports; everything else is just a game. Personally, I prefer to watch and participate in auto racing where turning left and right are involved.

may the best woman win

Hillary's perseverance over obstacles makes her right for U.S. Senate position

As our small, yet always capable of being corrupted student governing elections are taking place, other interesting elections are brewing throughout America. Namely, the New York senate race between Rudolph Giuliani and Hillary Rodham Clinton.

So let us turn our heads to the sister city of Washington D.C., and see just what is going on with the first lady and her shady rival (not in reference to that certain male who fits this definition but tends to live on and off at the White House).

So, she announced her candidacy. She emerged from the initial polls with only a slight lag behind the Republican mayor. She since has produced campaign slogans featuring Hillary, minus the infamous last name. She traveled into what must have been the most terrifyingly satiric territory of the Late Night with David Letterman show.

She moved out of the White House, leaving Billy boy with only the dog for company. And she now has announced she will be marching with the Irish homosexuals and lesbians in New York's St. Patrick's Day Parade. She confidently is enraging the conservative Irish community of New York.

She is participating with an organization that is publicly banned from the official fifth avenue parade. She is going to score votes within the gay and lesbian community because of her initiative into their rights. She is taking a stand.

This is a woman who, for the past few years, has been in the public spotlight in what I can describe — in the least-possible derogatory terms — as pathetic.

Some say she is a feminist nightmare.

Some say she is the entire corruption of the entire Bill Clinton administration.

Some say she is the reason a right-wing conspiracy ever was even a household word.

Some say she is ugly and has fat ankles.

I say she is the perfect definition of a form of upgraded morality that America should be braced for, because tradition is fast flying out the back door and nobody likes to drive in reverse.

In light of the entire Monica Lewinsky scandal, Hillary's questionability as a woman was all that was an issue in regard to her point of view on the subject.

Hillary consistently has defended herself and her husband in the media and kept her composure the entire time (remember the Today Show interview?). If she is to be considered pathetic, then what is the world going to do if George W. Bush receives the Republican nomination and eventually takes a seat in the Oval Office? I will tell you what will be pathetic in representation of our nation — Bush struggling to remember the name of the foreign official with whom he is in negotiations regarding nuclear war or something to that effect.

In reality, Bill

Clinton is by no means the first male to commit adultery. He will not be the last. Hillary is not the first wife ever to be the innocent party. She will not be the last.

Celebrity comes with the expectation that one never will have a moment of privacy without someone intruding.

Hillary took this bull by the horns and simply kept her dignity and a smile on her face. Let us not forget she is a woman and a human being.

Anyone who reads Cosmopolitan magazine, or watches television for that matter, knows that women constantly struggle with their outward appearance. They struggle with self-esteem issues and have far more pressure upon them to please than males in this country ever will know. Hillary had to keep her face, even though the strain of the anger she must feel toward her husband for his actions. This woman should be nothing but commended for her behavior.

American society seems to be on the brink of accepting some new rules, but time is all that is going to speed this process along. People like Bill and Hillary Clinton seem to almost function as catalysts to this process, and that seems to me to be nothing but encouraging.

The lies and falsity that a human life possess are limitless, and although children do not need to be thrown right into the frankness of the subject of dishonesty — it is honestly a part of human nature.

To continue ignoring and acting outraged by actions such as Bill Clinton's by impeaching him is a ridiculous and fake reaction that must be similar to the back stages of a modern debutante ball.

November is speed-balling toward us, and then decisions will have to be made.

Although Hillary is slightly down at 41 percent in opposition to Giuliani's 48 percent (according to a March 2 Quinnipiac College poll), hope cannot be lost.

The population of New York voters is dominated by women. Giuliani currently has the approval of women and Jewish voters, but we shall see once the months start passing.

I believe more women will vote for Hillary simply because of her gender.

I believe she can bag this senate seat if she continues with her logical and intelligent strategies.

It is time to get past the ridiculousness of the current ruling morality that has been placed upon the society of this nation since early last century.

This is a new millennium. This is the time to sit back and advocate change in the form of societal rules.

Without that, this country could lose valuable individuals who are completely capable of bringing America into a positive and updated balance simply because they choose to stay with their adulterous husbands.

KELLIE FARRELL/ COLLEGIAN

Opinions deserve place on Collegian's Opinion page

Friends, due to the fact that I am one step away from being Fred Phelps, use "simple minded, self-righteous blind faith," and "blah, blah, blah, you know, we've heard it all before," I have decided that I won't force my beliefs on you any longer.

I mean, after all, that is what I've been doing. There is nothing like seeing someone sitting alone in the K-State Student Union and beating them with a Tuesday Collegian until they give in to my demands and read my viewpoint.

You're reading this right now, and it's only because you have no choice in the matter, and because of that, I apologize. I suggest you read this fast and make this process as painless as possible.

If my mom knew I was running around terrorizing this campus and kicking down people's doors and forcing them to write a letter to the editor about a column that I made them read, she wouldn't be pleased. She might even be more angry than she was when she found out about my casino adventures after reading that column in January.

Seriously, who do I think I am? I can't believe I have the gall to put my opinion on the Opinion page.

Maybe if I wrote a column that had no opinion at all, everyone would be happy and, precious Campus Fourum space could be used for something else.

OK, I'll give it a shot. This non-opinion thing is relatively new to me, so please bear with me.

Let's see — It's almost spring, am I right?

Actually, let's not ponder whether I'm right, because in order to do that, one must assume that truth is not relative, and in today's sophisticated society of free-thinking individual truth seekers, my concept of spring might be different than yours. Maybe spring doesn't happen for you until August.

Sorry if I offended anyone.

Here's something — it really sickens me when a 6-year-old boy brings a gun to school and kills a classmate. My heart sinks whenever I read about another school shooting. The little girl who died will never experience her 16th birthday, high school graduation or college life.

What happened in Michigan is disgusting and wrong. Oh, but wait — truth and morals are relative, remember?

While I consider what happened to this 6-year-old girl a disheartening brutal act, someone else might see it as a justifiable response to a playground dispute, so who am I to say it is wrong?

Once again, it would be rude of me to impose my beliefs on someone with a different view on this issue, so again, I'm sorry.

It was interesting to read David

Levin's viewpoint on morals and the like. According to him, we don't need God to establish what is immoral and what is not.

In last week's column, David said, "Human beings thrive best in a social environment that is harmonious and conducive to being productive. Human behavior which promotes productivity and harmony is, in an objective sense, morally good. Behavior that impedes productivity and harmony is, in an objective sense, morally bad."

Thus, behaviors such as murder, theft and cutting in line at the theater are morally bad because they degrade the fabric of a productive harmonious society. Murder is more of a social outrage than cutting in line because murder degrades the social fabric to a greater extent than line cutting.

If a harmonious social environment is the only thing for which we are living, then we are a pathetic, wretched species.

If truth is relative and there is no God or afterlife, what's the point of life if it is all over after we die?

You see, the funny thing about truth is that it's true. If I know that something is true, and if you disagree, then one of us is wrong.

Truth is not relative — we can't both be right.

So, if I say the little girl's death is wrong because the God-given feelings inside of me say it is, and you believe it's because of something else, one of us is wrong. Something tells me the pain her parents must be feeling right now stems from something other than the fact the action wasn't harmonious to our society.

I don't apologize for anything I've written or believe, but if any of you buy into the theory that this girl's death is wrong because it degrades the fabric of a harmonious society more than say, line cutting, then for that I am truly sorry.

Officers convicted in cover-up of torture of Haitian immigrant

By TOM HAYS
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Amid heightened tension between the police and the black community, three white officers were convicted Monday of a cover-up in the attack of a Haitian immigrant brutalized with a broken broomstick in a stationhouse bathroom.

The guilty verdicts in one of New York City's most notorious cases of police brutality came 10 days after four white officers were cleared in the shooting of West African immigrant Amadou Diallo, an unarmed black man who died in a barrage of 41 bullets.

In Monday's verdict, former patrolman Charles Schwarz, 34, and officers Thomas Wiese, 36, and Thomas Bruder, 33, were found guilty of lying to investigators to conceal Schwarz's role in the 1997 attack on Abner Louima, who suffered severe internal injuries.

"Not only are we now getting convictions of police on misconduct but actually for the conspiracy. This is a real blow to the blue wall of silence," the Rev. Al Sharpton said.

Louima's cousin and family spokesman Samuel Nicolas said, "This is not a happy occasion for us. We are not opening champagne bottles." But he added, "Now we can start the healing process."

The officers' convictions carry up to five years in prison. No sentencing date was set.

Schwarz also could get life in prison when he is sentenced for his 1999 conviction on charges of holding down a handcuffed Louima as Officer Justin Volpe sodomized him with a broken broom handle.

In the latest trial, prosecutors sought to show that the three officers hid behind a "blue wall of silence" within the department.

"The verdict today should send a message within the police department that there is no greater betrayal of the badge than to ensnare a fellow officer in a web of lies and deceit," U.S. Attorney Loretta Lynch said.

The guilty verdicts triggered an outburst from the three defendants and their supporters.

Schwarz cursed loudly as he was led from the courtroom. Wiese and Bruder, free on $100,000 bail, wept, and Wiese cradled his mother after she collapsed in a hallway.

Bruder's lawyer, Stuart London, suggested the Diallo verdict and the protests that followed may have put pressure on the jury of six blacks, five whites and one Hispanic.

"It's hard to ignore the post-Diallo, anti-police climate that resides in this city," London said.

Attorneys for all three men said they will appeal, and Schwarz's lawyer said he asked that Schwarz be placed on suicide watch in jail.

Louima was not in the courtroom for the verdict.

"What Abner Louima wants more than anything else is for what happened to him to never happen to anyone else's children," said Sanford Rubenstein, an attorney for the Louima family. The family is suing the city for $155 million.

Prosecutors had accused the three officers of telling "lie after lie" to save Schwarz. They offered phone records as evidence that showed the officers spoke many times in the weeks after the attack.

Both Volpe and Schwarz had insisted Schwarz was never even in the Brooklyn police station bathroom during the assault.

Volpe, who pleaded guilty to the attack and is serving a 30-year sentence, testified at Schwarz's trial for the first time about the attack, saying he mistakenly thought Louima had punched him during a disturbance outside a Haitian nightclub.

Volpe testified that Wiese was present during the torture but made

The verdict comes 10 days after four officers were cleared in the shooting of West African immigrant Amadou Diallo, an unarmed man who died after a 41-bullet barrage.

no move to join the assault or stop it.

Wiese had told detectives shortly after the attack that he entered the bathroom to find Volpe standing over Louima, stick in hand, and then dragged Louima to safety by his feet.

As in the first trial, Louima testified that he could identify his second assailant only as the driver who took him to the police station.

Slow response to African floods spawns bitterness

By ANDREW SELSKY
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MAPUTO, Mozambique — Waiting to board a plane to inspect the damage wrought by catastrophic floods, former first lady Graca Machel summed up Mozambicans' growing bitterness over wealthy nations' failure to hurry to her country's aid.

"It seems the world has no conscience when it comes to human life," said Machel, now the wife of former South African President Nelson Mandela.

Planes and helicopters crisscrossed the southeast African nation on Monday delivering food and other aid to hundreds of thousands of flood victims. An editorial in the country's main newspaper, Noticias, echoed the sentiments of many Mozambicans: "When the West wants to intervene militarily anywhere in the world, they get there in record time."

The anger focused on the hours and days after Feb. 27, when a wall of water roared down the Limpopo River valley from neighboring Zimbabwe, sweeping away hundreds of villages and thousands of people.

Seven South African air force helicopters rushed into action to pluck flood victims from the tree branches and rooftops. They were soon followed by two more choppers from impoverished Malawi. But in the next few critical days, no one else pitched in.

"A lot of people are getting killed," U.N. World Food Program spokesman David Schaad said on Feb. 27.

Despite appeals from Mozambican officials and aid agencies, it wasn't until Sunday that additional helicopters arrived from Germany, Britain and Spain. U.S. military choppers will not be flying over Mozambique until Tuesday or Wednesday, U.S. Air Force Maj. Mike Young said.

Nicky Ramage said she hopes she can help lead her team into the NCAA Tournament and encourage the team's inexperienced players like the seniors did when she was a freshman.

trust in FRIENDS

STORIES BY MICHAEL NOLL

Ramage, Finkes provide team leadership, consistency

Three years ago, women's basketball forwards Angie Finkes and Nicky Ramage were inexperienced freshmen, but now as seniors, these two Big 12 Conference honorable mention players are looking to lead K-State through the Big 12 Tournament.

While Finkes and Ramage have been the consistent leaders of this year's team, the scene was quite different when they joined the program, Finkes said.

"To be honest, Nicky and I our freshman year had our heads in the clouds," Finkes said. "We didn't really know what we were doing."

As freshmen, the two played on a senior-dominated team that went to the NCAA Tournament, and the appearance gave the freshmen an unrealistic idea of what it took to play that caliber of basketball, Ramage said.

"We felt that this can happen every year. 'This is easy,' to go to the NCAA Tournament," Ramage said.

The truth was that it really took lots of practice and leadership, Finkes said.

"It was definitely the senior class that year that carried it the whole way. They knew what it took," Finkes said. "We had no clue. We were just dumb little freshmen trying to run in there and remember the plays."

Now that Finkes and Ramage are seniors, however, they know what it takes and have found realistic expectations for themselves and their team. Finkes said their successful introduction to college basketball has raised the bar for this year's team.

"I expected us to do much better than we have done," Finkes said. "I think we can be a better team than we were this year. We just lost too many close games this year."

The teammates also have learned what to expect from themselves on the court and to not worry about what the other one is doing, Finkes said.

"She can do things that I couldn't do in a million years. I don't even try. My body doesn't move in ways that hers does," Finkes said as Ramage laughed.

"She's athletic, and I'm more fundamental," Finkes said. "I think about us at Ahearn. Coach (Kamie) Ethridge showed us this move, and it was a really athletic move. Nicky made it look easy, and I thought, 'I can do that,' and I totally wiped out in front of all these little kids."

"So I quit trying to do 'Nicky' things a long time ago, when I about broke my leg," she said.

The mutual respect the players have on the court extends off the court as well. Ever since their freshman year, Finkes and Ramage have roomed together and been great friends. They have spent so much time together that when someone tries to talk to them together, especially in interviews, one is always interrupting the other.

"A lot of times, we think so similar that one of us knows what the other one is trying to say if it's not coming out right," Finkes said. "It's not like Nicky's trying to take the limelight and saying, 'No, don't quote Angie, quote me.'"

The closeness of the two share off the court has created benefits on the court as well, K-State head coach Deb Patterson said.

"They've got a great feel for one another's timing. There's great verbal as well as non-verbal communication between the two of them," Patterson said. "A lot of that trust on the floor is an extension of trust off the floor."

On the floor, Finkes and Ramage are now trying to use their senior leadership to guide their team through the Big 12 Tournament and possibly gain a berth in the NCAA Tournament.

Finkes said they do not feel any added pressure as seniors playing their final games.

"If you go in thinking 'this is going to be my last game that I'll ever play,' you'll play like crap," Finkes said.

Neither Finkes nor Ramage has played poorly. Both average double digits in points, have received Big 12 honorable mention this year and are confident heading into Kansas City, Mo.

Their roles have reversed. Now some inexperienced freshmen are looking at Finkes and Ramage for leadership in the tournament, and both are ready to accept the challenge, Ramage said.

"They're going to be tough games, but they're not games that we can't handle," she said.

Women's team confident about tournament

The K-State women's basketball team believes it can win its first game of the Big 12 Tournament against Oklahoma State at noon today and, eventually, the entire tournament.

Even though the eighth-seeded Cats only mounted a 6-10 record in conference play, they still believe they are a force to be reckoned with, senior forward Nicky Ramage said.

"I think we can go in there and take it all the way," Ramage said. "I think we can surprise people."

This sense of confidence comes from the Cats' last game, a 64-47 win over Colorado, in which they seemed to hit on all cylinders. Ninth-seeded Oklahoma State, on the other hand, enters the game on a three-game losing streak. However, the regular season doesn't matter much when tournament time rolls around, senior center Angie Finkes said.

"During the regular season you can kind of get bogged down, especially when you're in the nine, 10, 11, 12 spots," Finkes said. "You can get on big losing skids, but I think everybody tries to come into the tournament with a lot of momentum and clean slates. It's anybody's ballgame."

An important factor in how well the Cats and Cowgirls play this afternoon is how well they handle the five days of rest both teams have incurred since their last game. Ramage said she welcomes the extra rest.

"I'm glad that we played on a Wednesday instead of past Saturday," Ramage said. "It gives us a chance to get our legs back and get our energy back because games are really emotional and can really drain you."

Once the Cats step on the floor in Kansas City, Mo., they will have more immediate concerns than rest. Oklahoma State senior guard Jennifer Crow has been the team's main offensive power all year with a 21.7 points per game average. In Oklahoma State's 64-71 loss to K-State earlier in the year, Crow still tallied 22 points.

In the Cowgirls' last two games, however, a new threat has emerged in sophomore center Jessica Bates. In Oklahoma State's last game, a 68-77 loss at Oklahoma, Bates scored 28 points and grabbed 13 rebounds.

As a result, K-State will have to defend the Cowgirls intelligently, head coach Deb Patterson said.

"When you've got a player like Jennifer Crow on the floor, there's always a huge offensive threat on the floor at all times," Patterson said. "So, we've got to be very aware of where she's at and at the same time play very intelligent on the defensive end of the floor because Bates is starting to step up. They've proven that they can score on us."

Yankees' season off to slow start, doomed to fail

Does anyone else see a baseball mutiny shaping up? Do yourself a favor and check out the exhibition baseball standings. At the bottom of the standings in small print just below the Texas Rangers and Kansas City Royals it reads: "Defending World Champions and absolute wealthiest team on the face of the planet, the New York Yankees, hated by every small market fan alive, has 0 wins and 3 losses."

I want to be the first to make the prediction: the Yankees won't win a single game this season. That's right, the boys in pinstripes will finish the season with one less "W" than George W. Bush.

You might be asking yourself, "What about the pitching staff that looks like a fantasy roster, and the relief guys who could pitch blindfolded and still get more K's than most teams combined? Or how about the offensive line-up that is, admittedly, no murderers row, but that still strikes more fear in the hearts of pitchers than the sound of tearing ligaments? How in the world can you claim that the Yankees will lose every stinkin' game this year? Are you crazy?"

No, but I did sleep at a Holiday Inn Express last night.

The Royals, on the other hand, are getting pretty good at losing, too. For the Royals, losing is one of those inevitable things like the chicken pox or falling asleep in your philosophy class. Honestly, the world will stop spinning if the Royals have a winning season. It's become such an expected thing that ministers in Kansas City have changed the wedding vows to "Do you take so-and-so to be your lawful wedded wife until death do you part, or until the Royals can piece together a win streak longer than two games?" That's how sure people are that the Royals will stink again this year.

The good news is that while the Royals might drastically resemble last year's losing team, this year they likely will lose with a little more flair and excitement.

Boy, that thought should get the season ticket sales going. Aside from pitching, the only weak spot is at first base where converted catcher Mike Sweeney slowly is learning how to field a ball without appearing to have paddles for hands.

The double-play duo of Rey Sanchez and Carlos Febles should provide solid infield defense, and both are expected to put up better offensive numbers this year.

The outfield is overflowing with solid players. The starting three likely will be the same as last year: Johnny Damon in left, Carlos Beltran in center and Jermaine Dye in right. That means the Royals have to send power-hitters Dermal Brown and Mark Quinn to the minors.

If you listen to the rhetoric coming out of the Royals front office, you must really be bored, but you also would know that the Royals really are positive about what the next few years have in store.

Not even a Holiday Inn can make me believe that before I see it. The biggest move for the Royals, and the one they caught the most flack for, was trading Jeremy Giambi to the Oakland A's for Brett Laxton.

This might turn out to be one heck of a great trade. Jeremy joins his brother Jason Giambi in Oakland, and the Royals receive some much needed pitching. My guess is that Jeremy will play better than ever in Oakland under the tutelage of his older brother. His offensive production will be missed in KC, but the guy fielded balls like he had moon boots - on his hands. The truth of the matter is that the Royals aren't in a pinch for offensive production, coming off their most prolific run-scoring year ever. What they did, and still do, need is pitching. The Giambi trade was a positive move.

The National League Central will be the power division, but I'm not sure it will shape up like everyone else thinks it will. Cincinnati Reds fans believe the year 2000 really has meant the return of the savior. Ken Griffey Jr. is turning more heads in Cincinnati than the 3-D section of the Sports Illustrated swimsuit edition.

But apparently the baseball pundits only have short-term memory. After all, the arrival of Mark McGwire in St. Louis did little for the Cardinals' win percentage. The Reds might have trouble riding on Griffey's back all the way to the World Series.

The Reds are going to need another stellar year from their pitching staff if they want to survive the NL Central. I think the Houston Astros are being overlooked. They might be the actual contenders to emerge from the NL Central. They have a proven pitching staff starting with last year's should-have-been Cy Young award winner Mike Hampton. The relief crew is just as intimidating. Houston also promises to produce some major offensive firepower. Jeff Bagwell might not be Griffey, McGwire or Sammy Sosa, but he's no chump either. The Astros might use their newfound obscurity to shake things up in the homer-happy NL Central division. Griffey might be Cincy's savior, but it remains to be seen when the team's salvation finally will take place.

K-State women's tennis team loses 2 matches, snaps 4-meet winning streak

By DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Following the team's best start since 1997, the K-State women's tennis squad dropped two matches this weekend in Madison, Wis.

On Friday, K-State fell 5-4 to No. 51 Brigham Young (5-3) in non-conference tennis action.

The Cougars used two come-from-behind doubles victories to snap the Wildcats' four-meet winning streak and extend their own current mark to four meets.

"It was a very tight match," K-State head coach Steve Bietau said. "We really had to breakdown in doubles serving, and that was a problem in trying to finish the match."

The Cats led at No. 1 and No. 3 doubles but lost both matches, 8-6. K-State's lone doubles win came at No. 2, where freshman Petra Sedlmajerova and junior Eva Novotna defeated Eline Chiew and Kim Kelly, 8-5.

In singles action, the two teams split the six matches. Sedlmajerova bounced back after losing her first set of the spring to defeat Chiew 6-2, 0-6, (10-8).

Other singles winners included junior

Anna Pampoulova and Novotna. Pampoulova avenged a loss to Liza Khoudoiarova at the regional tournament in November, winning 6-3, 6-3, at No. 3.

Novotna also topped Kelly, 3-6, 6-3, (12-10), in three sets at No. 4 singles, but BYU triumphed at both No. 5 and No. 6.

On Saturday, the Cats dropped their second straight match with a 5-4 loss to No. 59 Wisconsin.

Once more, doubles proved to be the deciding factor in the match, as the Badgers took two out of three doubles matches to pull out the victory.

"It was a very tough weekend for the team," Bietau said. "The matches were very close, but we just couldn't find a way to get that fifth and deciding point."

The duo of Sedlmajerova and Novotna were once again the lone doubles victors, defeating Linde Mues and Katie Dougherty at No. 2, 8-6.

In singles play, Sedlmajerova extended her perfect singles record in the spring to 9-0 with a 0-6, 6-2, 6-1, win over April Gabler.

Against the Badgers, Bietau moved Pampoulova up to No. 2 singles for just the second time this season. The junior triumphed over Vanessa Rauh, 6-2, 6-3.

Sophomore Kathy Chuda also provided a bright spot in the match, coming back from a 5-2 deficit in the final set to defeat Dougherty, 1-6, 6-4, 7-6 (7-4).

The Cats are now 0-11 lifetime against BYU and 0-3 in its history against Wisconsin. "We haven't been hurt like this yet this year," Bietau said. "It will be a test to see how we can bounce back from this tough weekend."

Up next, K-State will open Big 12 Conference play March 11 at Texas Tech.

The Cryptoquip is a substitution cipher in which one letter stands for another. If you think that X equals O, it will equal O throughout the puzzle. Single letters, short words and words using an apostrophe give you clues to locating vowels. Solution is by trial and error.

Health QUESTION

By: Carol Kennedy
director of health education and promotion at Lafene Health Center

Q: How do students know if they are getting all of the proper vitamins?

A: Generally speaking, college students who eat a nutritionally balanced diet have no need to supplement their diets with additional vitamins.

To determine if you are getting enough of the right vitamins, check your diet. Do you eat grains, fruits, vegetables, dairy products and meats or proteins every day? If you are consuming a special or non-traditional diet (vegetarian), it might be helpful to consult a dietitian to determine if all nutrition requirements are being met.

In addition, excess amounts of vitamins that are fat-soluble (A, D, E and K) can be toxic in large doses. Excess amounts of water-soluble vitamins (B and C) are readily removed from the body.

Medical conditions can affect vitamin absorption in the stomach. It is best to consult your health-care provider, a dietitian or both before beginning a special diet.

CAFFEINE ADDICTION

Getting high on caffeine unhealthy for students

BY CHELSEA SCHMIDT

hat goes up must come down.

This is good advice for those who are addicted to their morning cup of coffee or can of soda, said Reita Currie, registered nurse, health educator at Lafene Health Center.

"Caffeine is a stimulant, which tends to increase alertness and physical activity which sometimes people use to counteract a down feeling," Currie said. "It is dangerous for the body if you are using it and not getting the adequate rest that the body needs."

Although caffeine is not considered as serious a drug as nicotine, the problems associated with overuse of caffeine can be devastating, Currie said.

"It can cause physical problems, such as an irregular heart-beat, which can interfere with other medical problems and aggravate them," she said. "It can also decrease fertility in women, and there is some evidence that links caffeine to miscarriage. It enters the blood stream and crosses the placenta to the fetus, causing a lower birth rate."

"We also recommend mothers not to take caffeine when breast feeding, because the baby could feel these effects," she said.

Caffeine, however, does have a positive side, and it sometimes is used in medical prescriptions.

"When combined with aspirin or Tylenol, it can help relieve headaches, especially migraines," Currie said. "It relaxes smooth muscles, especially in breathing, and sometimes people who are having trouble breathing may get a little relief."

According to a newsletter produced by the KSU Alcohol and Other Drug Education Service, 82 to 92 percent of the adult population in North America consumes caffeinated foods and drinks. These include coffee, tea, soft drinks, chocolate and some over-the-counter drugs.

"The effects of the drug depends on the amount used," Currie said. "Also, your body weight and the diet of the individual make a difference."

Currie said if caffeine is taken in moderation, there are not many risks. However, she said college students tend to drink it in the morning in order to wake up and late at night to stay alert while studying.

Jenny Stieben, senior in elementary education, said she consumes two to three cans of Dr Pepper daily, but does not feel she is addicted to the stimulant.

"I would say it is more of a habit," she said. "I usually drink it with meals and at night, especially when I'm studying."

Chris Kellogg, graduate student in modern languages, said he also drinks it out of habit.

"I usually get a 32-ounce of Dr Pepper in the morning," he said. "It's a habit more than anything. I really just like the taste of it, and my favorite pop only comes in caffeinated."

Both Stieben and Kellogg said they think they could quit if they wanted to.

"I've quit before without any problems," Kellogg said. "It's not the same kind of addiction like nicotine. It doesn't do the same types of things to your body."

Currie said she recommends a gradual step-down method in order to quit drinking caffeine.

"It's best to gradually decrease it and drink lots of water and take lots of fluids," she said. "Also, switching to decaf first is easier, or you could even mix caffeinated and decaffeinated and step down until you gradually go off the decaffeinated."

Although the side effects of overdosing on caffeine can relate to serious injuries, Currie said caffeine in moderation shouldn't cause any problems.

"Like anything else, it depends on how much you use," she said. "If it's a dependency, you can't get along without it, and it interferes with your life. Anything that becomes a problem like that is something you need to work on because there are probably other problems."

"If you can take it or leave it at anytime, you're probably not dependent on it, and you're probably OK."

"I've quit before without any problems. It's not the same kind of addiction like nicotine."

Group focuses on safety during spring break

By JAINA K. STUTHEIT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Don't rely on luck.

That's the theme for this year's Safer Spring Break Week, sponsored by STD, HIV, AIDS Peer Educators and Lafene Health Center. The activities will be from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. today, Wednesday and Thursday in the K-State Student Union. Each day will have a different theme, and free items and information will be handed out.

Marisa Maune, senior in family studies and human services and coordinator of Safer Spring Break Week, said SHAPE will be focusing on five health topics throughout the week. The topics include tobacco, skin cancer, safer sex, safety-belt usage and alcohol.

"This is a week to inform students of some potential risks they may face while away from K-State on spring break," she said.

Maune said they will be passing out "Safer Break Kits" containing pamphlets on the focus topics, condoms, a safety whistle, bandages, pens and pencils.

Today's themes are tobacco and skin cancer.

Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotion at Lafene, said these are two important health issues of which people should be aware, especially tobacco.

"Tobacco is the number one most preventable cause of death," Kennedy said.

Wednesday's themes will be sexually transmitted diseases and safer sex.

Amy Mauk, junior in social work and family studies and president of SHAPE, said they will be giving out free condom-grams. These are safe sex greeting cards with a condom inside. Students can send the condom-grams to anyone they choose. Delivery is free anywhere on campus and to all fraternities and sororities.

"We did the condom-grams on Valentine's Day, and they went over really well," Mauk said. "We want to start giving them out more often."

Maune said they want to let students know they can send the condom-grams to whomever they want, and that they are not promoting sex in any way.

"The main message is that abstinence is the best way to protect yourself from STDs, but if you are going to have sex, you should do it safely," she said.

Maune said one in three sexually active people will contract an STD by the age of 24. She said the three most common STDs both nationwide and on the K-State campus are genital warts, chlamydia and herpes.

"Anyone who is sexually active should be tested for STDs," she said.

Thursday's activities will take place outside the Union in the free speech zone and will focus on alcohol and safety belt usage. The Kansas Highway Patrol will be there with a roll-over simulator.

Maune said the simulator is a machine that rolls the cab of a truck with dummies in it to show what it's like to be in a roll-over accident.

Kennedy said the machine is used to encourage people to wear their safety belts.

"The number one killer of K-State students is motor vehicle accidents," she said. "Most of those fatalities could have been prevented if the person had used their safety belt. We'd like to bring that to their attention with the roll over simulator."

Kennedy said this is an event that's done every year two weeks before spring break, and they will continue to have it every year.

"We look at statistics about K-State students and their health needs when choosing the topics," she said.

Maune said she encourages students to come and learn more about the risks they face.

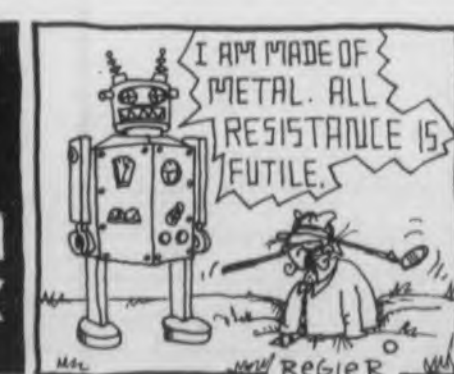

"I think it's important for students to keep in mind that they need to protect themselves against all kinds of risks," she said. "Most people think of risks as drugs, drinking and sex, but there are many other risks to think about. This is an all-encompassing way to address all of them at once."

Maune said the "Don't rely on luck" theme shows students they are not invincible, and they have to take proper precautions and make good decisions now to ensure a safe and healthy future.

"People can't rely on luck to save them from the consequences of the choices they make," she said.

St. Louis provides alternative site for Mardi Gras celebrations

By EMILY COCHRAN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

If partying with millions of sweaty and drunk Mardi Gras revelers in New Orleans is not an option and if Brazil's even bigger celebration is out of reach, consider St. Louis for your 2001 Mardi Gras destination.

The Gateway to the West is less than six hours away by car and is the site of the third biggest Carnival festivities in the world, behind Brazil and New Orleans.

Historic Souldard is where Mardi Gras celebrations play out in St. Louis. Souldard is one of the city's oldest neighborhoods, named for the Frenchman who surveyed the area for the king of Spain.

In February and early March, the area comes alive with the Mardi Gras spirit as hundreds of thousands of pre-Lenten bacchanal partiers flock to the neighborhood and take to the bars and streets in search of blues, parades, cajun food, brew and beads.

Carnival goes have several events from which to choose, including the two day Absolut Taste of Souldard and Micro Beer Taste, several different masked balls, a wine taste and art show, a Wiener Dog Derby, and the Mystic Krewe of Barkus Parade, where dog owners dress their pets in tutus, tuxedos, top hats, capes and beads and join a parade with the other 5,000 four-legged friends to compete for a place among the 17-member royal canine court, which includes earls, dukes, Rex and a court jester.

At night there are bands galore to be heard — each bar has its own party where there is plenty of blues, beads and brew for all. The two-week celebration culminates in the Grand Parade on the Saturday before Mardi Gras.

Unfortunately, several late night riots in years past have resulted in this year's city ordinance that orders Souldard bars to close at 10 p.m. on Fat Tuesday and at 1 a.m. on the weekends leading up to the day before Lent.

This year, city and Souldard officials canceled the Fat Tuesday parade because of last year's riot. Do not be discouraged. There is still a lot of fun to be had in Souldard, and the best weekend to go is the weekend preceding Fat Tuesday, which this year is today.

mardi gras in history

Mardi Gras, with its beads, parades and balls, has roots in the pagan winter solstice celebrations that commemorated the death and birth of nature, fertility and prosperity.

During the Roman Empire, the celebration evolved to include feasts of food and drink.

Faced with the difficulty of separating the prolific heathen activity from their own ancient traditions, early Christians incorporated pagan winter solstice celebrations into their own ancient traditions by celebrating Christmas near the pagan winter solstice.

Their seasons of Advent, Christmas, Epiphany and Lent allowed the continuation of pagan celebrations as long as an epiphany theme was present in every aspect of the festivals.

Heathens and pagans alike created secular meaning in the tradition of Epiphany in the idea of carnival, derived from the Latin words "carne" (flesh) and "vale" (farewell).

The heathens, pagans and barbarians were allowed to sin carnally in the weeks leading up to Ash Wednesday as long as they said vale, or farewell, to those sins on Shrove Tuesday. The confession secured the sinner's freedom from burden for the period of Lent to Easter.

Costumes became a large part of Epiphany and Carnival traditions when Twelfth Night masquerading became the rage in Europe during the Italian Renaissance. European immigrants brought their traditions of pre-Lent celebrations to America. During the Industrial Revolution, the tradition faded in America when the working class came to regard the festivities as a superstitious waste of time.

The French kept the spirit of tradition alive in New Orleans, however, and by the 1700s, the Tuesday before Ash Wednesday came to be known as Mardi Gras, or Fat Tuesday. In 1840, the first Mardi Gras parades took place, and the rest is history.

UGB talks about thefts in Union

By JASON BECK
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

The Union Governing Board discussed problems of theft in the K-State Union Bookstore and Union Food Court during its meeting on Monday, as well as addressing space-allocation concerns.

Members of the UGB discussed an internal audit that was done on the Union Bookstore after an investigation by K-State Police revealed opportunities for theft.

"Every retail store has a theft problem," said Kay Farley, assistant Union director of retail and bookstore manager. "Some semesters we know we have bigger problems than others."

Farley said both employees and customers contributed to the problem.

Last semester, Union Bookstore officials thought they had a theft problem and called campus police to investigate. After their investigation revealed opportunities but no serious problem, Farley said they asked the K-State Audit Department to do an internal audit.

"It was a situation where we thought we needed an investigation," Farley said.

After the audit was completed, 18 recommendations were made to the board, ranging from more timely monthly reports to analyzing inventory systems.

Farley said they were working on implementing these recommendations, and they had terminated three or four employees, and two others had left of their own accord.

"We're working on updating procedures," Farley said.

Carl Boger, faculty UGB representative, said he was in favor of prosecuting all shoplifters regardless of the situation.

"We all make mistakes," Boger said. "But we must prosecute anyone if we are certain they are stealing."

Farley said current procedure is to call campus police, but the county attorney was hesitant to prosecute shoplifters.

Members of the board also worked on a draft of a news release to implore students to help with the theft problem in the new food court.

Marketing and Promotions Manager Cindie Snyder said that it won't help solve all of the problems, but it would help the situation this semester.

Boger also expressed concern over the Sbarro's Pizza shop on the first floor. Boger said he thinks revenue is being lost.

"The new food court is magnificent," Boger said, "and the plans for the new coffee shop are magnificent. But the one weakness is Sbarro's."

Boger suggested more programming in the location, and possibly moving the pizza shop to the second floor with the new food court.

1 confirmed dead, 2 buried in debris in factory explosion

By KIA SHANTE BREAUX
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

RADFORD, Va. — Search dogs Monday located the bodies of two women under mounds of debris in an auto parts factory where an explosion also killed a co-worker.

The blast at New River Castings on Sunday night threw clouds of black soot over a wide area and left the building still smoldering the next day.

"There's mass destruction, a hole the size of a football field in the center of the plant," Fire Chief Lee Simpkins said. He estimated damage at $30 million.

Rescuers and search dogs worked their way through charred, twisted metal in the factory. The dogs discovered that the women were buried under a tremendous amount of debris — so much that it will take days to get to them, said Dan Crumrine, a dog handler.

"Our priority is to find and remove these loved ones," Simpkins said. "This is going to be a long process — it's not going to be done overnight."

Company officials and fire officials said they didn't know the cause of the explosion. Officials from the Occupational Safety and Health Administration were on the scene. Radford is about 160 miles west of Richmond.

Firefighters and maintenance workers found the body of Curtis Grooms, 29, near the core of the explosion. The missing women were identified as Karen Anderson Hamilton, 35, and Debbie Sheppard, 37.

Heller student body presidential tickets for inaccurate contribution reporting Monday.

Hall and Hoskinson pleaded guilty to the allegations, while McCurry and Heller pleaded no contest.

"Most of your tickets that spent a lot of money had some violations," Travis Morgan, Student Senate elections chair, said. "But that doesn't sound unreasonable. When you're dealing with that many people and that much money, it's to be expected. But there are consequences to that."

The tickets each were fined $10 for the minor violations, he said.

Hall and Hoskinson, student body presidential and vice presidential candidates, were fined for an additional violation. They pleaded guilty to mass-distribution violations in addition to the inaccurate reporting of contributions violation. They were fined an additional $10 for the second violation.

Hoskinson said both of their ticket's violations were unintentional.

"Nothing was blatant," he said. "One of our contributors probably forgot how much they donated to us."

Hoskinson said the mass-distribution violation was due to a misunderstanding. The pair sent a campaign e-mail to someone they didn't know, though one of their campaign staff did know the person.

According to SGA election codes, candidates only can send e-mails containing campaign language to people they know.

"Somebody gets an e-mail, and they don't even know the people who sent it — that's when it becomes a violation," Morgan said.

"That violates the K-State junk mail policy. That's not a rule that we made up out of thin air."

McCurry and Heller, student body presidential and vice presidential candidates, pleaded no contest to the inaccurate reporting violation and paid the $10 fine.

McCurry said he was surprised to learn about his violation, but he trusts the Election Committee's judgment.

"I stand by our report," he said. "But I think it's a thorough process. I think it's honest."

The committee found contribution violations by following normal elections procedures, Morgan said.

"We go through and spot check," he said. "If people on the contributors lists don't pan out as having contributed to their campaigns, the candidates are fined."

However, Morgan said if the committee only finds one inaccuracy, it's not a serious problem.

"If we spot check 40 people and find three mistakes, then that's pretty major," he said.

Although the committee did a lot of spot checking Sunday night, it isn't finished, Morgan said.

"We're not done. We're never done," he said. "That will be a continuous process."

However, the committee doesn't plan to check every campaign contributor at this point, Morgan said.

"If we thought that it was going to be worth throwing someone out of the campaign, we would," he said. "We're not going to do anything rash."

Presidential candidates weren't the only SGA candidates to receive violations this week. Two arts and sciences candidates for Senate also received violations.

Tyler Darnell, freshman in political science and arts and sciences senatorial candidate, pleaded guilty to chalking too close to the K-State Student Union, Morgan said. SGA elections codes state candidates can not mark within 10 feet of campus buildings.

Mona Olteanu, sophomore in political science and arts and sciences senatorial candidate, pleaded no contest to hanging posters with ribbon rather than twine or string as stipulated in SGA elections guidelines.

Neither violation was serious, Morgan said. Darnell had to clean up the chalking, and Olteanu had to remove the signs hung with ribbon.

Morgan said the nature of the violations is different in this year's campaign, but overall numbers are down.

"We've really curbed the violations like chalking in the residence hall zones, but we're playing it all by the book," he said.

FEE

nobody specified that in the past year."

The English department ordered their T-shirts through the store It's Greek to Me.

Ron Petersen, store manager, had another explanation for the department's confusion.

"They've done designs in the past that don't use 'K-State University,'" he said. "My understanding is that anything that uses things of that nature, we pay a licensing fee."

The No. 1 royalty revenue is the football program, and the greek system as a whole is the No. 1 student group creating revenue, Fairman said.

All royalties go to scholarships, with $10,000 going to the cheerleading squad, $17,000 for the K-State Marching Band and the rest divided between general students and student-athletic scholarships, he said.

"A lot of organizations find it's an advantage to indicate this," Fairman said.

The English department is selling T-shirts for between $10 and $20 to pay the royalty fee, which is 8 percent of the product's wholesale value.

Election results to be televised

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Student Governing Association will announce the results of the 2000 student body general election at 8:30 tonight on cable Channel 8.

Election Committee chair Travis Morgan said he will take the results in a sealed envelope to the Kansas Regents Educational Communications Center in Dole Hall to be read on television. The Student Senate and universitywide councils and boards will be read first. The presidential results will be announced last.

If there is an outright winner, that presidential ticket will be interviewed. If there is a runoff, then the two runoff tickets will be invited to Dole Hall to be interviewed on television.

"A coin will be flipped to see who will go first," Morgan said.

The other candidates will be sent to a closed room so they can't hear the questions and interview.

"That way, there can't be any rebuttal or anything," Morgan said.

During the time it takes for the presidential and vice presidential candidates to get to the broadcasting studio, student body president Jason Heinrich and vice president Gabe Eckert will talk about their term and what they've done.

The television announcement is being made possible by the A. Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications, in cooperation with the Educational Communications Center.

Jim Mock, manager of production services at the center, said Morgan called and asked if the SGA could do this, and the center agreed.

"We're looking forward to it," he said. "We think it will be a great opportunity for the student election committee to get their information out quickly to a lot of people."

Mock said students are volunteering their time to help out, and he is donating some of his time to the service.

Morgan said besides the advantage of getting the results to all the candidates at the same time, this also gives students in journalism an opportunity to gain experience. Three journalism students will be on camera, and two will be helping Mock co-produce the show.

"It gives students a chance to practice journalistic skills," Morgan said.

Heinrich said he thinks this is an improvement over the way SGA previously has announced results. In past elections, candidates either were called or visited by members of the election committee.

"I think it will definitely reduce the waiting time for candidates, especially for the candidates who have waiting parties," he said. "When we were there, it took longer than they told us it would take."

Students still can cast ballots for Student Governing Association elections until 6 tonight.

Computer and Networking Services updated browsers on some computers in its labs so students can do just that in more labs on campus.

"CNS has gotten on the ball," Travis Morgan, elections chair, said.

On Monday, the first day of elections, the committee learned some university computer labs didn't have netscape browsers that would support online software for the election.

Morgan said CNS notified the committee Tuesday that the computer labs in Justin, Seaton and Dickens Halls had updated software on a few machines. He said those computers only will be used for elections, and students should be able to vote there today. All lab computers will have the updated software should there be a run-off election.

The elections committee also added a second polling booth in the K-State Student Union. Students voted there Tuesday and still can vote there today until 6 p.m.

Sarah Dillingham, graduate assistant in the Office of Student Activities and Services, said the committee added the second booth because it is more visible.

"We just realized there's a lot more exposure on the first floor by the food court," she said.

Although the elections committee isn't keeping numbers, she said the second booth has been busier than the original one.

"We've been really, really steady," she said.

However, she said she couldn't compare the numbers voting at polling booths this year to the numbers of people voting last year, because of online elections.

"Last year, as many people as could fit at a table could vote at one time," she said. "Here, it's two at a time. I might have two people every five minutes, but how many people are at home in their rooms or in classroom labs voting? You can't really tell."

Joel Ybarra, junior in psychology, voted at the new polling station Tuesday. He said had the polling booth not been so visible, he probably wouldn't have voted.

"But it's so convenient," he said. "I didn't know it would be this easy."

Dillingham said the Union polling booths provide not only convenience, but also privacy.

"We have our little trees for privacy," she said.

Privacy isn't the only thing the Union polling booths offer, however.

Dillingham also said voters can look at a voter's guide, have questions answered and get a sticker for voting at the polling booths.

She said most questions voters have are about write-in ballots.

"We send them to the OSAS office," she said. "We have a room set up there where people can do write-ins."

Minimum wage hike proposed

By CURT ANDERSON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Despite opposition from President Clinton, House Republicans are forging ahead with legislation to slash inheritance taxes and cut other taxes for businesses to offset the cost of raising the minimum wage by $1 over three years.

Republican leaders generally oppose raising the $5.15-an-hour minimum wage, but are willing to put the issue to a floor vote Thursday to appease GOP moderates who have strong labor constituencies and to give conservatives another election-year opportunity to vote for tax cuts.

Using a chunk of the projected budget surplus estimated at $122.7 billion over 10 years, the tax package would sharply reduce the estate tax, boost contribution limits for 401(k) plans, make health insurance fully tax-deductible for the self-employed and enact several tax changes favorable to small businesses.

House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Bill Archer, R-Texas, said raising the minimum wage alone would saw off the bottom rung of the economic ladder by reducing the number of jobs smaller employers could afford to offer.

"This modest tax relief for those who create jobs will provide an effective antidote to the job-threatening potential of a higher minimum wage," Archer said.

Under the bill, the hourly minimum wage would rise to $5.48 this year, $5.81 in Gore's win might trigger Bradley's withdrawal

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Al Gore swept past Bill Bradley from Maine to California, pushing his rival to the brink of withdrawal in the Democratic presidential campaign.

George W. Bush won California, New York and five other Super Tuesday primaries, accelerating his drive to vanquish John McCain from the Republican presidential race.

McCain won four states Tuesday, but none beyond independent-minded New England, and told supporters that he and Bush might meet again, but did not say they will.

"We're very pleased with the victories we won and disappointed with the ones we lost,"

McCain told The Associated Press shortly after calling Bush with congratulations. He said he will meet with his aides Wednesday "and talk about our future."

Bush won California, Ohio, Georgia, Missouri and Maryland by double-digit margins — and broke McCain's hold in the Northeast with narrower victories in New York and in Maine. He won the Minnesota caucuses as well. McCain won Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island and Vermont as voters in 13 states participated in the year's largest night of Republican presidential contests.

On the democratic side, Gore won from New York to Georgia to Ohio to California, and at several stops in between, regularly gaining 60 percent of the vote or more.

Polling place interviews with voters in every region of the country underscored the vice president's strength among core constituencies vital in Democratic primaries.

Gore won the vote of independents, a key element of Bradley's electoral strategy, and a group that the Democratic nominee will need in the general election race.

Bradley telephoned his congratulations to Gore, then appeared before supporters. Despite his defeats, he claimed credit for having launched the beginning of a new politics and for elevating the issues of gun violence, poverty and campaign finance reform.

He said he would announce his plans in the next few days, and aides did nothing to discourage talk of a withdrawal.

Cancelled primary might decrease Kansas voter-participation rates

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

While many states were participating in the presidential primary on Super Tuesday, Kansas was left to sit back and watch.

For the second presidential election in a row, Kansas has canceled its state primary.

Kansas Secretary of State Ron Thornburgh said the 1996 primary was canceled because it was assumed that presidential candidate Bob Dole would win Kansas, and President Clinton would win the Democratic nomination.

Thornburgh said he disagreed with that line of thinking.

"If we can start predicting what's going to happen, why have elections?" he said.

The 2000 presidential primary was Mother of slain child asks for support of Jake's Law

INDEPENDENCE, Mo. — Christy Robel is grateful for the support she has received since her son was dragged to death during a carjacking two weeks ago.

But she is asking the community for one more favor.

"They can sign the petition that will help to make Jake's Law a reality," Robel said Monday after a public forum on a proposal to require records checks before anyone is released from police custody.

The proposal is named for her son, the 6-year-old boy who was dragged to his death Feb. 22 by a car thief in Independence.

Kim Davis of Kansas City, Mo., who is charged with killing the boy, had been released from the Carroll County Jail just hours before Jake's death, even though a warrant for his arrest was pending.

Nearly 100 people, including Jake's parents and U.S. Rep. Karen McCarthy, D-Mo., attended the forum at Glendale Elementary School in Independence.

Gina Gerdes of Raymore and Kim Thomason of Lee's Summit told the crowd the proposal would require that:

— Individuals convicted or suspected of criminal activity not be released from any correctional or law-enforcement agency before a records check.

— Individuals convicted or suspected of criminal activity not be transferred from custody of one law-enforcement agency to another before a records check.

— All correctional and law-enforcement institutions have access to a database of pending charges and warrants.

"Although we have no relationship to the Robel family, Jake's death affected us deeply and prompted us to stand up for our rights," Gerdes said.

"In drafting this bill that will be called 'Jake's Law,' we have taken a stand for what we believe in, for society and our children's futures."

Most of those who packed the school's small library signed the petition. About 70 petition forms were picked up, with each petition having space for 125 signatures.

McCarthy said she supports the effort to see that no other lives are lost because someone was released from police custody without a background check.

However, she also said she believed that most of what the proposal addresses already is covered by other laws. She said $200 million is budgeted nationwide to support a criminal-database system.

"I think what we need to do now is make sure this criminal-database program is adequately funded," McCarthy said. "And we need to make sure that there is training available for the persons who have to use this program, and that the equipment is in place for it to be used properly."

Academy Award's ballots missing weeks before show

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. — Ten mailbags with all 4,000 Oscar ballots are missing in a real Hollywood whodunit for Academy Awards executives, a distinguished accounting firm and the U.S. Postal Service.

A week after mailing the ballots, tucked in business envelopes with 33-cent, first-class postage, the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences was getting panicky Tuesday because its members hadn't received them.

The deadline for returning ballots is March 21. The Oscars are March 26.

"We mailed the ballots, 4,000 of them, to Academy members last Wednesday, and Price Waterhouse Coopers took the 10 mailbags to the Beverly Hills Post Office and left them there as would anybody," Academy spokesman John Pavlik said.

"That's the last they have been seen," Pavlik said, who also said foul play isn't suspected.

The mailing had been treated with considerable fanfare by the Oscar people, who invite the news media to witness the annual ritual at the Academy's offices.

In Washington, Postal Service spokeswoman Monica Hand said the agency is investigating.

If the ballots aren't found, the numbers on them will be invalidated and new ones will be printed and mailed.

Ballots have been lost by the post office previously. In 1982, nominating ballots mistakenly were stuck into a bin marked for non-priority bulk mail. The ballots were found in time.

CLARIFICATIONS & corrections

There was an error in Tuesday's Collegian.

Steve Hall and Ryan Hoskinson pleaded no contest to campaign violations.

TAKE note

Census information. Census data being released Wednesday show that more than a fourth of Hispanics, the nation's fastest-growing minority, live below the poverty level. Only one in 10 is college-educated.

More than 25 percent of the nation's 31 million Hispanics lived below poverty level in 1998, considered then to be $16,600 for a family of four. About 8 percent of non-Hispanic whites lived in poverty in 1998.

Getting better wages could get tougher for Hispanics, especially recently arrived immigrants, because of increasing demand for college-educated workers, said Gumecindo Salas, vice president for governmental relations of the Hispanic Association for Colleges and Universities.

About 11 percent of Hispanics had bachelor's degrees or higher, compared with 28 percent of non-Hispanic whites.

The data are part of the Census Bureau's Current Population Survey on Hispanics, the last population estimates before the 2000 Census.

"The tradition among all immigrants in the U.S. is that after two or three generations, you tend to see a movement up in educational level," Salas said.

But with Hispanics, "because you have so many coming in over time, it tends to undermine that level of improvement. It may not appear to be improvement, but it actually is."

The Hispanic population is expected to triple to 98 million by 2050. In the half-century, Hispanics could become the nation's largest minority group, with their percentage of the population rising from about 12 percent now to 24 percent.

Within the Hispanic population, Cubans are more likely to have a college education and least likely to live in poverty.

About 25 percent of Cubans have bachelor's degrees, compared with 11 percent of Puerto Ricans and 7 percent of Mexicans.

At the same time, 27 percent of Puerto Rican families lived in poverty, compared with 24 percent of Mexican families and 11 percent of Cuban households.

"The country's Latino population is not as homogeneous as some might think," said census analyst Roberto Ramirez.

Calling Campus Fourum not as effective as voting

Greeks run K-State. A smoking resolution is an insane idea. There are not enough minorities in student government. Statements like these appear in the Campus Fourum and in campus conversations daily. Today is the last opportunity students will have — until next year — to cast their ballots and make sure their voices actually are heard. When polls close at 6 tonight, for the most part, K-State will have sealed its fate in terms of leadership for the next year. Certainly, calling the Fourum or telling your friend might let you vent, but face it: the Fourum in no way effects change. If students want to change the composition of K-State's student government, they're going to have to expend some effort and vote. In actuality, little effort will need to be used. Students can sit at their computers and vote for student body president and vice president, Student Senate, Fine Arts Council and other student government positions. All they miss out on is the "I voted" sticker. With such ease of voting, there are no excuses for students to continue complaining. Sit at your computer. Visit candidates' Web sites and the Collegian's online voter's guide. Decide which of the candidates you like and don't like. Then visit kats.ksu.edu when you're ready to vote. There are plenty of non-greeks running for office this year. There also are many minorities vying for positions. If unrepresentative representation is a concern of yours, do something about it. Or don't. Sit at home and don't waste five minutes to vote, or maybe 15 to make a reasonably informed decision. After all, if you change things, what will you have to complain about in the Fourum in the upcoming year?

spring FEVER

Bask under rays, enjoy time outside, obtain furry animals to elude life's rat race

A few nights ago, it snowed. Really. If you want to argue "it was just flurries," well, fine, play your meteorological semantic games. They were six-sided ice crystals descending from above, and in my book, that equals snow, thank you, Willard Scott.

Today, I walked to campus and saw more skin on pedestrians than I get when flipping through the premium cable channels at 2 a.m. Not that I mind. Even the squirrels are going au naturel now, sunning themselves on the little pink patches that used to bear fur.

Face facts, the groundhog was screwing with us. And I don't think this is the first time I've ever said that sentence.

As much as I'd love to run out and bronze myself under that refreshing, cancer-causing nuclear explosion hovering in the sky, sadly, I work nights. After repeated attempts, I've determined (a) you can't get a moon-tan, (b) despite the crispness and radiance of the days, it's not too close to summer to get frostbite and (c) explaining to security that you're just laying out "mooning yourself" is not the best way to get your name into the paper.

Anyhow, if spring indeed has sprung again and this isn't just some giant psyche-game Mother Nature is using to jerk us around in persistent retaliation for that whole "poison the environment and rape the earth" thing, then we owe it to ourselves to take advantage.

For every morning we spent scraping windshields or skittering across ice-coated sidewalks, let's indulge, shall we?

Now, being the intelligent, cultivated and resourceful readership you are, you're already rife with ideas on how to "carpe" the hell out of all the "diem" spring's ready to give you. And yet, I feel an obligation to dole out advice on how to do so. Why? Call it my ever-helpful personality, call it my generous nature, call it my need to plunk foreign phrases into my column to make me sound so deliciously brilliant and make you swoon. But, really, it's more than that. It's more than my benevolence; it's more like a contractual obligation.

What if you have a roommate who isn't willing to leap, arms wide open, into the glory of spring? Well, some people gotta have springtime thrust upon them. Prop their bed up to the window and catapult 'em out. Throw grass clippings in their face. Bury them up to their waist in fresh peat. Plant 'em like a petunia (unless they work nights, in which case they're probably well-armed and more than likely willing to plant anyone permanently who violates their precious sleep time).

OK. You're in the megalawn between Casa de Wefald and Anderson Hall. What do you do? Well, you can throw a Frisbee. If you want to play it perfectly safe, utterly mundane and god-awful monotonous, you can throw it back and forth to each other with all of the excitement of C-SPAN highlights sponsored by Sominex. Invent your own Frisbee game. I've never liked "Ultimate" Frisbee — that seems like such a pompous label for a game, begging it to be surpassed. What about "Jet Li's Combat Frisbee," a bone-breaking, jaw-dislocating, retina-detaching, joint-popping contact sport like no other? Rules? Whatever (at absolute worst, you probably can forget the Frisbee).

Ideally, to fully appreciate spring, you need an animal. Some opt for the traditional bunny rabbit. And if you don't want to shell out live-bunny prices (whatever they are, I haven't priced them since shopping for Valentine's Day brunch), you always can use your imagination to its fullest by giving the gift of life to a stuffed rabbit.

So your friends will insist that your bunny isn't "animate," "breathing" or "really alive." You know better. The bunny's alive, just ... socially restrained. Talk to the bunny. Take the bunny to class. Require those who speak to you also to address the bunny (If no stuffed bunny is available, substitute an appropriate springtime critter. Recommendations: gorilla, alligator, marmoset.)

You know what this time of year is best for, though? Perspective. Grab your lunch and take it somewhere outside on these perfect days. Relax. Enjoy. Reflect and cherish. Days like these are aberrations in the Kansas climatic landscape, meant to be cherished and reveled in.

If you want to mope and brood, fine. That's what rain is for, and it's ideal for the task. But we don't celebrate the sun as often as we should anymore, trapped in our hamster wheels and mouse mazes.

Selfish? Perhaps. Indulgent? Maybe. But ours is a society that revels in its victimization and is punctuated by moments of unbelievable cruelty and brutality. The imperative, the raw need to appreciate a slice of natural beauty — an aspect all too often ignored in our daily desperate lunges for the brass ring — can center you in ways you never quite expected.

Me, I'm always astonished by how many years of war can be rectified by a single, perfect moment of peace.

Oh, and God will kill you all because you all suck. Almost forgot.

The Collegian's Reader Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on any topic for 20 seconds.

I just read the Collegian's Voter's Guide, and all I see are candidates who I don't want in office. Is there any way to vote to keep them out?

I want my "I voted" sticker. I voted online at home. It's not fair.

I really wish these Frisbee golfers would go somewhere besides campus to play their pointless, fruity game.

I thought newspapers were supposed to report unbiasedly, especially in elections, that way not to sway the vote. This is a democracy, I thought.

This online voting is great. Never before have I been able to look at porn and vote for student body president and vice president.

Way to go, Joe. Confine Scott's column to eCollegian only.

How can you guys have a box score without giving assists and turnovers?

I'm so glad I get to listen to the sororities tonight, selling themselves like the women of the night they are.

Is it fair the Collegian will not print any views the general student body has in the SGA elections, but they're more than happy to endorse their own candidate?

I'm all for the greek system, but during bid week — or whatever it is you call it — if you're going to break the law, don't wear your letters.

How am I supposed to read the Fourum when there is a chick in her underwear on the next page?

I'm so glad that on Super Tuesday, one of the most important days of the primary race, the Collegian can have no coverage on anything about the race.

I'm sure glad to see Jeff Elliott wasting some more good paper with his last column.

I found Jeff Elliott's column Tuesday very offensive. I am sick of him forcing his views on everybody else on campus.

Who really gives a damn about butterflies?

Hey, monkey-slash-human guy. I didn't think your Jack Handey rip off was that funny. Neither did my pals.

Those booms you're hearing are not from Fort Riley. They're from Scott Roney and Jeff Elliott thumping their Bibles.

I'm not sure, but I think my classes this semester are making me crazy. Well, I gotta go. Karl Marx wants to play me another game of chess.

Thank you, thank you, thank you, Jeff Elliott, for the absolutely fantastic column in Tuesday's Collegian. He said it all, folks.

Greek Affairs adviser positive influence at university

I am writing to share with you some of my experiences with Barb Robel in hopes that you, and the larger K-State community, will see her for who she is — a hands-off mentor for young officers struggling to govern a complex greek system. I have no desire to be anything other than completely transparent in this column — I am an admirer of Barb and I consider her a good friend and confidant.

Before beginning my term as external vice president of Interfraternity Council, I often wondered how a woman could manage the governing of fraternities. Before my election to the IFC, I had fallen into the trap of misinformation that is so readily available on any given college campus with regard to greek advisers. I believed, as most others do, that Barb was anti-greek, anti-functions, anti-alcohol (thereby, anti-fun), anti-Homecoming and anti-tradition. As I sit at my desk writing this, I am highly embarrassed by this confession. I hope to convince you of my gross ignorance and naivete of a few years ago and show you the true Barb.

Within the first week of my term, Barb made it clear to me she was the Greek Affairs "adviser," not the Greek Affairs "director." Though Barb always was available for support or advice, the progress and efficiency of the fraternity or sorority system during a given year depended, to a large degree, on the quality and aggressiveness of the current IFC and Panhellenic Council officers.

Critics often argue Barb has her own agenda. I can recall no events that would substantiate this claim. During my term, IFC was confronted with an especially difficult judicial hearing regarding alleged hazing incidents at one of the K-State fraternities. Barb explicitly told the officers she would be available for inquiries regarding historical perspective or process, but that the verdict of guilt or innocence as well as the punishment, if applicable, was at the sole discretion of the IFC. Barb essentially said, "Okay, guys, you're the bosses. I'll help you if you ask for it and I'll support you regardless. But the decision is yours to make." Barb's attitude not only empowered the officers; it also was a great comfort to know that she was in our corner and would support the decisions we made.

As I'm sure many of you realize, K-State's greek system is nationally known for excellence. This is due in large part to the pride and passion Barb brings to our organization. Lacking much perspective beyond K-State, I was pleasantly surprised to learn of our stellar national reputation through interaction with other IFC officers at a conference in Chicago. Barb is a principled woman. Oftentimes, Barb will doggedly resist when her superiors request that exceptions be made to policies or rules slightly bent.

My most vivid memories revolve around late sorority rush entries. Though a certain grace period was allowed after rush applications were due, inevitably, individuals would submit grossly tardy applications each year. Barb always would politely deny their request for admission and encourage them to apply the next year. I admire Barb for this position. The easy thing to do would be to let in all, regardless of their punctuality. What Barb is doing simply is enforcing the rules decided by IFC and the council. The officers always knew that Barb would support their decisions. I cannot begin to describe what a comfort the knowledge of her support was to my fellow officers and me.

Finally, I am constantly amazed by Barb's ability to be completely disarming. On numerous occasions, forward-looking presidents of less-than-progressive chapters would come talk to Barb and solicit advice. Ultimately, these men became Barb's greatest fans. Barb's ability to calm confused young officers and reassure them of the validity of their goals and vision for their individual chapters is her greatest strength. I never have witnessed a male chapter adviser or consultant accomplish as much during a one-hour meeting with a chapter officer.

I thank you for reading this. I sincerely hope that some benefit can be gained from its reading — that you might see Barb for who she is, the Greek Affairs "adviser," not the Greek Affairs "director."

Writing this has been a good exercise, as it has forced me to think back to all the positive influences I encountered at K-State. Barb Robel is at the top of the list. Thank you, Barb.

Tim Riemann is a former student body president and member of IFC. You can e-mail him at timriemann@hotmail.com.

Service program might help K-State

■ Jason Heinrich sees nationwide program as beneficial to students.

By JAMIE BARRETT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Community service isn't just important for Student Body President Jason Heinrich.

It's a vision. Heinrich, senior in industrial engineering, helped to make K-State a member of Campus Compact, a nationwide service program.

Heinrich said he saw community service as an important part of education during his presidential campaign and heard about Campus Compact at a leadership program he attended last summer.

"I had been thinking about what I would want to do to incorporate more service into the university and heard about Campus Compact at the National Leadership Conference," Heinrich said.

Campus Compact is a nationwide service program composed of college and university presidents that focuses on showing students the benefits of public and community service.

K-State's membership in Campus Compact will require faculty members to incorporate service into their courses, as has been done voluntarily for years.

Heinrich said he began work on Campus Compact by presenting his idea to Juanita McGowan, director of American ethnic studies; Susan Scott, director of leadership studies and programs; Carol Peak, director of the Kansas Center for Rural Initiatives; and Provost James Coffman.

McGowan said that when the idea first was presented to her, she thought it would be exciting for the university.

"Service is taught through experience, and I thought this program would bring a practical and real experience to our students," McGowan said.

Heinrich said he brought the program to the attention of K-State President Jon Wefald in order to get the program under way.

"President Wefald wrote the letter to the national organization to make us a member," Heinrich said. "We both saw it as the kind of engagement that K-State should be involved with."

McGowan said Campus Compact is something that will broaden the total student experience for K-State students.

"One of the things that we teach here at K-State is that learning occurs outside of the classroom," McGowan said.

"The beauty of the program is that it will expand the curriculum and provide a better linkage program for K-State students," she said.

Heinrich said Campus Compact has many benefits because it can bring grants, money, scholarship opportunities and fellowships to K-State.

"The benefits are numerous," Heinrich said. "A program like this is a new mission in higher education."

KSU grant supports service projects

By JAMIE BARRETT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Thinking about community service and participating in it are two different things.

With a three-year $430,000 service-learning grant, K-State is taking action to participate seriously in community service.

The New Linkages grant was given to K-State, intending to incorporate service learning into its curriculum.

Carol Peak, director of the Kansas Center for Rural Initiatives, said the program is intended to give students real-life experience in the area they are studying.

The Kansas Center for Rural Initiatives has many programs in existence that already are teaching students community service.

Sammie Ezell, senior in family life and human services, is the student coordinator for a program called International Teams, where students are selected to perform service acts at different sites around the world.

"We are preparing now for the program," Ezell said. "Each student will spend 8-10 weeks at their host site this summer and will do a reflection course on their service in the fall."

Ezell said the program was something needed by service projects on campus.

"It gives a unique way of seeing another culture while doing a service to the people there," Ezell said. "It is a neat alternative to the normal study-abroad programs."

Another program through the Kansas Center for Rural Initiatives is Community Action in Leadership and Learning.

Shanna Burruss, junior in English, is the student coordinator for CALL and said this leadership program will give students a chance to do community service in Manhattan.

"We do a lot of community-service projects like Adopt-a-Grandfriend, for example," Burruss said.

"We also work for grants for faculty so they can use service projects to relate to their coursework."

Along with these programs, the Kansas Center for Rural Initiatives also sponsors other services for students, such as a tutoring program.

Burruss said the community service they do is helpful because it gives the students a chance to interact with the community.

"It is a great way to meet new people, network and provides excellent job experience," Burruss said.

"It gives a unique way of seeing another culture while doing a service to the people there."

1st-round loss to OSU stifles Wildcats' chance for conference title

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The K-State women's basketball team suffered a 59-67 loss to Oklahoma State in the first round of the Big 12 Conference tournament, ending its conference season on a low note.

The contest was filled with ups and quished it.

Oklahoma State entered halftime leading the Cats 38-21, and much of that lead could be attributed to the Cowgirls' effectiveness on the offensive boards. They grabbed nine offensive boards, most of which occurred after K-State had forced Oklahoma State to use up most of the shot clock.

"In the first half, Oklahoma State's ability to dominate on the offensive and defensive boards, I felt, was critical to the fact that they were able to extend the lead to the extent they were in the first half," K-State head coach Deb Patterson said. "We weren't necessarily poor defenders on the first possession, but I think that after missing a rebound opportunity and giving Oklahoma State a second and third opportunity, those were the possessions where they really took advantage."

When the Cowgirls did score, it was without their biggest offensive weapon, Jennifer Crow, contributing. Crow scored just three points in the first half and only 10 in the game. Instead, the Cowgirls were led by point guard Chantoya Hawkins, who scored 23 points in the game, and forward Toya Releford, who added 17 points.

Patterson said the balanced attack was frustrating.

"It was a great offensive effort by Oklahoma State. If we shut a door on them, they found a way to open the next one," Patterson said. "I thought Chantoya stepped up very big and was a great presence, and just the fact that they were able to get a balanced attack throughout the better part of the game caused us a lot of problems as we tried to narrow the gap, especially in the first half."

K-State, down by 25 points, began to battle back with about seven minutes remaining in the second half. It was then that K-State adjusted to Oklahoma State's physical style and found its offensive rhythm.

K-State rallied with baskets from center Olga Firsova and three-pointers from guard Kristin Rethman to claw to within six points of Oklahoma State.

However, as confident as the run might have made K-State, the Cowgirls never thought they were losing control of the game, Crow said.

"I never felt that we were going to lose the game," Crow said. "I still felt that we were in control the whole time."

Prior to the run, the Cats' offensive frustrations were a combination of the Cowgirls' defense and K-State's poor execution, forward Angie Finkes said.

"On the inside, I think I was just trying to get the ball in to get it back out because

Near comeback ends in Cowgirl victory

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — K-State's Big 12 Tournament game against Oklahoma State almost was one of the team's greatest comebacks of all time.

Almost. After trailing the Cowgirls by 25 points, 53-28, with 12:49 remaining in the second half, it looked like K-State was doomed to end its season with one of its worst performances of the year.

However, the Cats fought back with a 31-12 run to close within six points of Oklahoma State. After turning what seemed to be a blow-out into a tight game, the Cats thought they were going to win the game, guard Kristin Rethman said.

"I thought that if we keep getting stops, keep rebounding and execute on offense, we had a chance of pulling it out at the end," Rethman said.

Unfortunately for K-State, though, the run came up short and Oklahoma State held on to win 67-59. K-State head coach Deb Patterson said she was proud of the team's comeback.

"I was real proud of the run that we made at that team when it would have been very easy to fold up tent," Patterson said. "I thought that was one of the most phenomenal runs that I've seen in a long time. I'm just sorry we had to be on the back end of trying to make it."

During the run, two K-State players took turns leading the Cats back into the game. Of the 31 points K-State scored in the final 13 minutes of the game, center Olga Firsova and Rethman each tallied 11 of them.

First it was Firsova, who twice grabbed offensive rebounds and converted them into second-chance

Outfielder steps out of shadow

By MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

It only was a matter of time before junior outfielder Benson Oleen became a mainstay in K-State's lineup.

That is, unless you ask K-State hitting coach Robbie Moen.

"Benny's a guy we envisioned at the end of last year as a role-guy for us: a right-handed bat, potential DH sometimes, a pinch hitter," Moen said, "but right now, he's kind of taken the right-field position and pretty much taken it over."

Entering the 2000 season, Oleen had stepped up to the plate 57 times in two seasons. He said he still was confident he would get his chance to start but had begun to question the decision he had made to play for K-State upon his graduation from Manhattan High School in 1997.

"It was tough going through 56 games and only playing in 10 or so," Oleen said. "I started wondering if it was the right choice, but one thing that helped me was Coach Moen's hitting style. It's taken me a couple of years to get it down, but it's paying off now."

Oleen's performance from the plate this year backs up his words. At this point in the season, he's first on the team in total bases with 22, slugging percentage at .579 and tied for first in doubles with four. He ranks second in batting average at .395, in on-base percentage at .425 and in hits per game at 1.25.

Moen credits Oleen's delayed success to having determination far beyond the level of the proverbial hard worker.

"He's a guy who really doesn't take 'no' very well," Moen said. "You tell him he can't or he sees himself not in the lineup, and he's going to go out and work harder to try and get himself in there."

In the first game against Oklahoma on Friday, Oleen cracked his first collegiate home run in 87 at-bats, something he said was overdue.

"I'm not a home-run hitter, but I know I can hit some home runs — it's kind of good to get it out of the way," Oleen said. "But it was a rush because it was against a team like Oklahoma and it took us 1-0."

In the next two games against the Sooners, however, the baseball

Barnett latest athlete in legal trouble

If the allegations about K-State offensive lineman Thomas Barnett are true, then one has to ask a simple question: Why?

Barnett was arrested early Friday morning in Wichita for kidnapping former K-State football player Leon Edwards.

Barnett allegedly drove Edwards to Wichita to retrieve a shotgun Barnett had given Edwards to cover a gambling bet.

Although, after arriving at Edwards' mother's house in Wichita, Barnett let Edwards venture into the house to fetch the firearm, unsupervised, mind you. Barnett apparently sat in his car and waited.

Meanwhile Edwards called the police, and Barnett was arrested minutes later.

I still don't understand what Barnett was thinking when he decided to let Edwards go into the house to get a gun without supervising him, but I guess that doesn't matter in the whole scheme of things at this point.

Barnett's alleged incident can't help but remind me of former K-State basketball player Pero Vasiljevic, who called the police to his house in 1998 to search for intruders he thought he heard. Pero did this not once, but twice.

The second time they came, and he was arrested for suspicion of marijuana possession, drug paraphernalia and obstruction of the legal process.

The most horrible aspect of the whole ordeal concerning Barnett is that yet another athlete has had a brush with the law.

The recent problems of professional athletes and, of course, Florida State, might have spread to Manhattan and K-State.

Sure, Barnett will be detained for some time as the courts attempt to determine whether he is innocent.

If he is guilty, the best thing K-State and head football coach Bill Snyder can do is to dismiss they were crashing in pretty hard every time we got the ball inside," Finkes said. "I was trying to get it to a guard to relocate."

Finkes, who scored just two points in the game, also vented the frustration she felt about ending her career on a sour note.

"As of now, I'm upset mainly at myself, because I don't think I played as well as I should have for this team," Finkes said.

Patterson, however, said she was pleased with Finkes' performance.

"I think Angie Finkes played a tremendous final game," Patterson said.

Patterson's consolation was small comfort to the Cats as they ended their season with a loss, and with tears of frustration. Patterson said she felt bad for the seniors, who have meant so much to the program.

"I would do anything for them to have gone out with a 20-win season or with a greater run through this tournament, but they left their mark and they've given us something to build upon," Patterson said.

points, all while playing with four fouls.

Firsova's outstanding play was especially important considering K-State had been struggling to handle Oklahoma State's physical style, Patterson said.

"I think that was a period of the game where we made some adjustments relative to the manner in which we wanted to attack on the offensive end," Patterson said. "And at that point, I thought Olga was playing physical, and that certainly helped for us to become a more physical presence at that point."

"I was really pleased with Olga's minutes, and her 11 boards really helped us."

After Firsova had finished scoring on Oklahoma State, it was Rethman's turn.

The sophomore nailed three three-pointers and a chip shot in a three-minute scoring flurry to finish off the run. Rethman, who had scored just five points in the first half, said she thought her shots were the result of better offensive movement.

"I think we had good screens. We executed better in the second half than in the first," Rethman said.

"I passed up shots in the first half that might have opened up more chances in the second."

Despite the performance of Firsova and Rethman, it was forward Angie Finkes, who had just two points during the run and fouled out with 1:44 left in the game, who ultimately caused the run to begin and end, Patterson said.

"Angie played a tremendous final game," Patterson said.

"I think she was on the floor every minute until she was fouled out of the game in the second half when we made that run and came back. It's also very apparent that when she left the floor, the run stopped."

gods frowned upon Oleen. He struck out six times, while leaving several base runners stranded.

"It's real disappointing especially when we're in the ball game, and there were runners on base and I didn't come through," Oleen said.

Oleen said he is looking forward to the rest of the season, though. After all, he likely will get around 150 more at-bats this season.

"Those things are going to happen. You're going to have days that you don't produce offensively," Oleen said. "You've got to remember them, but you've got to get past them, too."

Moen said a few small adjustments in Oleen's swing are necessary, but that he'll be back on top of his game soon.

"He did have a tough two games, but up until that point he'd been one of our hottest hitters," Moen said.

"I don't foresee Benny having the type of last two days he had this past weekend, this upcoming weekend."

him from the team.

These off-the-field incidents are becoming much too frequent — whether it is Atlanta Braves pitcher John Rocker, who made infamous remarks about minorities, homosexuals and New Yorkers in Sports Illustrated, or Darryl Strawberry, who has had numerous problems with drugs.

Then there is the case of Kansas City Chief kick returner Tamarick Vanover, who has pleaded guilty to grand theft auto and had his contract restructured last week when the team could have released him.

With all of these problems in sports, the lyric in Simon and Garfunkel's "Mrs. Robinson," "where have you gone Joe DiMaggio, a nation turns its lonely eyes to you," never has been more true, at least in my interpretation.

The wide world of sports is missing that one great icon who makes you love being a sports fan. Is there still such a thing?

If in fact that one athlete like DiMaggio is missing, it's time to step back and try to figure out where he has gone.

When athletes push the limits or defy the system on a regular basis, it really makes me want to rethink my love of sports.

These days, one can't just remember the statistics that relate to a favorite sports figure or team without knowing how many times he or she has been arrested or how many felons play for the club.

Granted, it's not fair to lump all athletes into one group, whether they play in Atlanta or Manhattan, Kan., because not all athletes behave like heathens.

To those athletes not plagued by off-the-field problems, I commend you. Because whether you like it or not, you are role models. Children look up to you, just like you looked up to the athletes that came before you.

So, before you go off and do something you might regret, take a moment to reflect on what your childhood hero would do.

We're running out of time, because if one were to do that ... say, five years from now, they likely will do the wrong thing because their hero did.

Tournament to celebrate opening of skate park in Junction City

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Dustin Mace, freshman in history, said the reason he likes in-line skating is because he enjoys trying bigger and more challenging feats.

Now, because of a new skate park that has opened in Junction City, a tournament has become available for rollerbladers and skateboarders in the area to try their hand at competition.

Jonathan Mitchell, freshman in public relations, said the skate tournament, which already has attracted 60 people from Kansas, Nebraska and Missouri, was started as a way to commemorate the skate park's opening.

"Since its completion in January, it has become the best outdoor park in Kansas," Mitchell said. "When we got the skate park, we wanted to have a celebration for all the hard work we did to get the park."

Mitchell said the tournament will begin at 9 a.m. April 1.

It will have four classes for different age levels — 16 and younger rollerbladers and skateboards and 17 and older rollerbladers and skateboards.

Prizes have been donated from many businesses in the area, as well as one from California.

The prizes include sports bags, t-shirts, 10 complete skateboards totaling $150 apiece and a free pair of skates.

Mace said the tournament will provide area skaters with the opportunity to compete with others to find out who is the best while also giving them the chance to have a good time.

"As soon as the park was completed, we all wanted to have the bragging rights at who is the best," Mace said. "A lot of us have been skating a long time and have never had the chance to compete."

Mitchell said they would like to continue the tournament in the future and said he is trying to take steps to create the Kansas Skaters Association, a non-profit organization to promote skating in the state.

Mitchell said he, along with several other skaters, will be taking a tour of Kansas this summer to have free tournaments and promote the building of other skate parks.

"The skate park is not only good for the people who use it, but the community as well," Mitchell said. "I have heard many complaints from businesses and K-State about people skating on sidewalks and the street."

"The park is a good place to skate and keeps kids off city streets and out of the way," he said.

Mace said he is surprised at the number of people who already have registered. He said he thinks it has to do with people's desire to represent their town and participate in a competition as large as this one.

"People like representing their hometown in a competition that is safe," Mace said.

"There are not a lot of people here in Manhattan who skate, but a bunch of us still want to participate and represent our town," he said.

Mitchell said that after three weeks of being open, there were more than 150 people at the Junction City skate park.

He also said on any given weekend, there can be more than 50 skaters and during the weekdays, between 30 and 40.

The Junction City skate park became a solution to the lack of a safe, legal place to rollerblade or skateboard.

Currently, youths in Manhattan are

Let the Good Times Roll

STORY AND PHOTOS BY REED DUNN

■ The show is scheduled to begin at 9 p.m. on Thursday at Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon. Admission is free.

Dustin Evans, Good Times to return to Rusty's this week

When K-State played Nebraska, Dustin Evans and Good Times played Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon. They've also played every year at Country Stampede, and Thursday night they will be back to Chance.

Evans, along with his band Good Times, has a big following in the Manhattan area, Kip Etter, Chance bartender, said.

"We had him play here for the Nebraska/K-State game a couple of years ago, and it went well. We've booked him for that same game this year," Etter said. "He works the crowd real well and he's just a great entertainer with his band."

Ben Dee, Good Times bass guitar player, said playing at venues such as Rusty's is fun and easy, because it brings the group back to its roots.

"We like it when people are right on top of us," he said. "It's real easy, because that's how we started."

Paige Roesler, Country Stampede festival manager, said the group's repeat appearances have helped increase its popularity in the area.

She said people who have seen Evans and Good Times always want more.

"When he comes back to play other venues in Manhattan, people want to see him because they have such a good time," Roesler said. "He's a high-energy act with a diverse range of songs."

The diverse range of music may be credited to the group's range of experience, Dee said.

He said three of the band members once were lead singers of their own bands and have brought a wide variety of influences to the group.

"We make it real casual and laid back," Dee said. "We play everything from Bob Wills and George Strait to new country to AC/DC."

"We can cover just about anything and we do," he said.

Evans said even though the band often is known for its true country, playing shows the size of Rusty's allows the band to take audience requests and be more interactive.

"We have more latitude to do cover tunes," he said. "We don't have to stick as closely to the country stuff. Whatever the crowd is into is what we do."

After four years of playing at Country Stampede, Evans said the band has grown a sense of attachment to Manhattan.

He said working with student security guards at the festival, the group has gotten to know much about the college and community.

"Everybody has been so receptive. The entire band has become K-State fans," Evans said. "We've gotten to be friends with the football players and some of the bartenders in Aggieville."

The Thursday show is scheduled to begin at 9 p.m., and Evans said the band will begin with some new music and break into a crowd-controlled concert later in the night.

"Early in the evening we'll probably play some of our new songs," he said. "Later in the show we'll do whatever the crowd wants."

Dee said local fans can count on future performances from the band.

"We have a blast in Manhattan," Dee said. "Manhattan's our favorite place to play. We'll always come back."

Dustin Evans plays the drums during a performance break at the fourth annual Country Stampede. Evans, along with his band Good Times, will perform at Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon at 9 p.m. Thursday.

KC string quartet to perform Thursday at museum

By CHRISTIE VANOVER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Students don't need to leave campus for an elegant date.

Kathrine Walker-Schlageck, education and public services supervisor for the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art, said the museum is offering an elegant opportunity through the Arts Above the Arch series.

On Thursday night, the museum is serving as host for the Summerfest Orchestra and a dessert bar.

The Kansas City Mo., quartet features Mary Garcia and Nancy Beckmann on violin, Rebecca Bell on harpsichord and Michael Murray on cello.

The selections from Vivaldi, Bartok, Biber and Bach incorporate with the museum's exhibition of the John A. and Margaret Hill Collection of American Western Art, Schlageck said.

"There's a Rosary Sonata that goes beautifully with the Spanish churches on exhibition," she said.

The evening kicks off at 7 p.m. with an all-you-can-eat dessert bar filled with mini cheesecakes, fruit tarts, chocolate cream puffs, carrot cake and chocolate cake, among other items.

"I promise the dessert bar will be really good," Schlageck said.

"We've done this before and set up the auditorium with candles. It's elegant."

After dessert, the orchestra will perform from 7:30 to 8:30 p.m. with an intermission.

"People will be able to look at the artwork on display during the intermission and can try to see the relationship between the music and the artwork," Schlageck said.

She said the museum is trying to bring in other arts groups like the orchestra that tie in with the visual exhibitions, such as story tellers, poetry and art workshops.

She said she is pleased that the museum's attendance keeps rising among students.

"I think we're becoming part of the campus community as something to do," she said.

Bonnie Wetta, sophomore in business administration, said she never previously has attended an orchestra concert, but said she "...having the dessert with a date or a group of friends would make it a little bit different way to listen to the music."

Council GROVE

STORY BY KRISTEN DYMACEK ■ PHOTOS BY REED DUNN

Restaurant continues to serve homecooked meals after 150 years

It's nearly 150 years old. At the time it was built, covered wagons were the means of transportation and the Kaw Indians still lived in the area.

Built in 1857 by Council Grove founder Seth Hays, the Hays House Restaurant and Tavern was opened as a restaurant and trading post for people traveling along the Santa Fe Trail.

The Hays House, which is along the Santa Fe Trail in downtown Council Grove, is the oldest continuously operating restaurant west of the Mississippi River.

Rick Paul, who owns the Hays House with his wife, Alisa, said it is one of the landmarks listed on the National Historic Santa Fe Trail and is rich in history.

Along with being a restaurant and tavern, Paul said the Hays House also served as a church, a courtroom, a hotel and a mail distribution center.

"On Saturday nights, men would go in for drinks," he said. "On Sunday morning, the bottles were covered, and they held church."

The original bar from the 1857 tavern now is in the cellar. Bricks from the first streets in Council Grove comprise the cellar floor.

Paul said even though the Hays House was reconstructed in the mid-1970s, each room contains at least a little part of the original building.

In the Seth Room, on the second floor, charred beams from a Council Grove fire in the late 1800s remain.

"The story is that the people came to save Hays House before the other buildings because it was the tavern and they didn't want it to burn," Paul said.

Even though the Hays House is full of history, he said the restaurant, which is open for breakfast, lunch and dinner, is well-known for its food.

"People first come here for the history, but they come back for the food," he said.

The Hays House recently was featured in Food and Wine magazine as one of the best restaurants in Kansas and Missouri.

Most of the restaurant's food is home-made, including skillet-fried chicken, ham, steaks, vegetables, pies and ice cream.

There also is a wide selection of in-house baked goods such as breads, rolls and muffins.

"I like cooking things that really taste good," Paul said. "We use every opportunity we can to get fresh products."

He said he uses a lot of butter and cream in the cooking, but there are healthy meals on the menu as well.

"We will also go upon a person's request," Paul said.

After eating, visitors can look through the small gift area.

"We have a lot of Kansas products as well as some of our products, like dressings and mustards," he said. "We also have some of our recipes for sale."

Joan Taylor, Hays House hostess, said it's the good food and service as well as the history that bring people to Hays House.

"There are a lot of people traveling, and they're interested in the history of the place," Taylor said. "But we also have a lot of regulars that come in everyday to eat and talk."

Bruce and Elois Harris were visiting from Lawrence and had been to the Hays House before.

"We were here a few years ago, and the food was just great so we decided to come back," Elois Harris said.

Bruce Harris said he likes how comfortable he feels at the restaurant.

"It's just a nice small-town atmosphere," he said.

The Hays House is closed Mondays but is open from 6 a.m. to 3 p.m. Sundays and 7 a.m. to 8 p.m. Tuesdays through Saturdays.

During the summer months, the restaurant is open until 9 p.m.

Paul said the Hays House also can be reserved for private parties and should be reserved well in advance to guarantee a spot.

The Hays Tavern, located on the second floor, is open at 5 p.m. Tuesdays through Saturdays.

Historic Santa Fe Trail plays significant role in city's development over time

The Santa Fe Trail was important in the expansion of Council Grove, Kan., in the 1800s.

Don Parks, curator of the Kaw Mission State Historic Site and Museum, said it began with wagons stopping to replace wagon parts on the way to Santa Fe, N.M.

"There were a lot of trees in the area that were used as wagon parts," Parks said. "It was a good place to rest and get organized."

Molly Smith, manager of the Council Grove Chamber of Commerce, said the town was in an important location.

"Council Grove was one of the few places on the Kansas prairie," Smith said. "It was really one of the last places anyone could stop to get service before reaching Santa Fe."

It was for this reason that Seth Hays opened a trading post in 1847, making Council Grove a main Santa Fe Trail supply point, Parks said.

Council Groves features several historic Santa Fe Trail sites.

The natural rockbed where wagons crossed the Neosho River can be seen on the south end of the riverwalk.

"River crossings were very tricky," Parks said. "It wasn't always easy to find somewhere to cross."

The Last Chance Store, built in 1857, is the oldest commercial building in Council Grove.

"The Last Chance Store got its name because it was the last trading stop between here and Santa Fe," Smith said.

A site that has built up a lot of rumors and stories is the Hermit's Cave.

"The story has it that an Italian priest from South America lived in the cave," Parks said. "One day he just left with a caravan and walked to Santa Fe. He became known as a healer and ended up living on a mountain. He was eventually murdered.

"We know the story is somewhat true, because there is a newspaper account of him living in the cave."

Smith said besides having several National Historic Sites, Council Grove also has 10 wayside exhibits provided by the National Parks Service.

"The 10 exhibits is the largest amount of exhibits that the National Parks Service has in any town in the country," she said.

A few other historic sites include ruts where the wagon trains cut into the ground on the way to Santa Fe, the Farmers and Drivers Bank built in 1892, and the Conn Stone Store built in 1858.

The Kaw story

Not only did the Santa Fe Trail affect Council Grove, it also affected the way of life for the Kaw Indians.

Parks said the Kaw, or Kansa, from whom Kansas got its name, lived in a large portion of Kansas until the mid-1800s, when they were moved to a 20-square-mile reservation where present-day Council Grove is.

By 1859, the reservation was reduced to one-third its original size because Council Grove had become a popular trading post for the Santa Fe Trail.

The Kaw were moved completely out of Kansas to the Indian Territory by 1872.

Today, after a 127-year absence from Kansas, the Kaw Nation has acquired 147.5 acres of land 3 1/2 miles southeast of Council Grove. Parks said they intend to develop the land into an historical park.

He said this is important both for the Kaw Nation and Council Grove because of their history.

"We think the Kaw story is becoming more important all the time," Parks said. "They were the first Kansans."

Not only are there plans for a park, but Parks said there already are some sites for people to visit that show a little of the Kaw tribal history.

Just outside of Council Grove are the reservation ruins of three of those houses as well as the Unknown Indian Monument and the ruins of the Kaw Agency Building.

Inside the city limits is the Kaw Mission State Historic Site. Smith said it was built in 1851 and was used for a small time as a school for the Kaw children.

"It was an attempt to try to bridge differences and intersect the cultures between the settlers and the Indians," she said.

Beside the Kaw Mission sits a hut the government built in 1861 for the Kaws.

"The Kaw Indians lived in teepees and bark and mat lodges," Parks said. "The government wanted them to live like white people, so they built these houses for them."

He said the Kaws didn't end up living in them but instead used them for stables and dog houses.

Smith said it's important to understand the history of the Kaw tribe.

"It's not only important to Council Grove, but to Kansas and the United States," she said.

"It's part of our heritage and it's important to pass it on to other generations."

Parks said the historical sites help people make a connection to the past.

"We need to connect people to a place," he said.

"We have two connections with the Kaw Indians. We inherited their place, and we've taken their name."

"The understanding of them and their story gives us a richer sense and understanding of our identity."

"The Guardian of the Grove," a bronze statue honoring the Kaw or Kansa tribe, was created by Mark Sampsel, a resident of Council Grove.

Top: An unknown Indian monument was built in 1925, 3 1/2 miles southeast of Council Grove. The monument is part of 147 1/2 acres recently purchased by the Kaw tribe. Plans are in progress to make the land the site of a historical park.

Bottom: The government built 138 homes like this in 1861 to provide housing for American Indians. The small stone houses were not used as residences but usually as stables.

Kramer Food Center to open academic resource area for fall semester

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students who live in or use the Kramer Complex soon will have a new studying resource designed to provide them with the best educational environment, said Skyler Harper, assistant director of the Department of Housing and Dining Services.

The Kramer Academic Resource Center, which will serve Goodnow and Marlatt Halls, is located within the Kramer Food Center and will be open at the beginning of the fall semester.

It will serve as an academic center with much the same functions as the Derby Academic Resource Center on the east side of campus, Harper said.

"We mainly started the renovation project with the intention of adding the resource center," Harper said. "We also wanted to take care of some fire marshal concerns. The main focus, however, was to focus on helping the students."

The renovation began its last summer with a new staircase and a handicap-accessible elevator. Harper said disabled students previously had to use a chair lift or a freight elevator in the rear of the dining center.

In the second phase, lighting, an acoustical ceiling and tables and chairs will be placed in the lobby.

Along with the replacement of all doors and windows will be the addition of a heating and air conditioning system. Harper said e-mail stations, much like the ones in Goodnow, also will be placed in the lobby.

"Students are now starting to see glimpses of the finished product and we are hearing really positive things," Harper said.

Within the resource center, Harper said there will be a high-tech computer classroom with a complete projection system, a movable podium, VCR and over-head projection capability.

The classroom will have a seating capacity of 60 to 70 students and already is listed on the fall line schedule as a classroom. Tutoring and study rooms also will be available, as well as a computer lab.

Hours for the resource center will extend into the later evening, similar to the center in Derby.

Adam Ehrmantraut, community assistant in Goodnow and sophomore in computer engineering, said the computer labs will be one of the more popular features of the center when it opens to students.

"We have a computer lab in the basement of Goodnow, but we have a very high turnover rate because of the small quantity we have," Ehrmantraut said. "The students who don't have computers in their room can easily go over to Kramer and use those computers because ours are always checked out."

Shana Meyer, coordinator of academie affairs for the DARC, said having an academic center on the west side of campus will be convenient for students because they will have use of the tutoring and studying resources that were not readily available to them before.

"The day we put the signs up advertising the center, we already had students ecstatic over having a resource center on that side of campus," Meyer said. "It is hard for students in the Kramer complex to come over to the other side of campus a lot of the time, so this will give them a nice space for both tutoring and studying."

Harper said renovations to the Kramer dining area will change the functioning to a better flow for the upstairs. He said the layout will be changed to mirror that of the K-State Student Union and the Van Zile Dining Center, which was renovated in the early 1990s.

"We want to better arrange the whole dining area to create a better flow for serving the food and the students," Harper said. "We have already had consultants in here to look at the renovation of the serving lines, and we think the rearranging of the functions will work better for everyone involved."

Meyer said the students will receive many benefits from the center when it opens, including tutoring, the computer lab and resources to help students with academics.

"Students are now starting to see glimpses of finished product and we are hearing positive things."

He said the next major renovations would be on the West and Marlatt Hall main lobbies.

Kansas Secretary of State to observe online voting

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The state of Kansas might be following in K-State's footsteps by implementing online voting in future state elections.

Kansas Secretary of State Ron Thornburgh is sending his administrative assistant to K-State today to watch the process of online voting and see how it goes.

"This is an exciting project in the state of Kansas," he said. "I'm confident that online voting is the wave of the future."

Thornburgh said that for the past five years he has been working on how to get more young people involved in the election process and said he thinks online voting is the best solution so far because the Internet attracts that age group.

Thornburgh said he has read many reports on online voting, and he followed the Arizona presidential primary, which was the first binding election for public office that was open to Internet balloting.

"I'm in the research mode at this time, trying to watch and learn," he said.

The Internet is such a part of everyone's everyday life now that Thornburgh said online voting should increase voter turnout.

K-State won't know if online voting increased voter turnout until polls close today. However, Votehere.net, K-State's online vendor for elections, states on its Web site that voter turnout most likely will increase because of easier access to the ballots.

Thornburgh said he thinks online voting is the direction of the future.

"I envision within the next decade that we'll have voting on the Internet in the state of Kansas," he said.

Student Senate Elections Chair Travis Morgan said he is excited that a representative from Thornburgh's office is coming to K-State to view the process of online voting.

"I'm excited to let them in on what's going on here," he said. "They should get a good show."

Morgan said a representative from Votehere.net also will be at K-State.

"We'll be counting ballots and treating guests," he said.

Thornburgh said he congratulates K-State on online voting.

"An important part of this message is that K-State is the leading edge to do this," he said. "I'll look forward to seeing how this works."

April 2001 and $6.15 in April 2002. Backed by organized labor, Clinton and congressional Democrats favor a $1 increase over two years and oppose the tax cuts as unnecessary and tilted toward the wealthy.

Clinton planned a Wednesday rally with Democrats at the White House. "Working families across this country deserve an increase,"

he said in a letter to selected lawmakers.

"Some are using this minimum wage increase to pass irresponsible tax cuts that would threaten our fiscal discipline and jeopardize our ability to extend the life of Medicare and Social Security and pay down the debt," Clinton told the party leaders in the House and Senate. "Let me be clear. This is the wrong approach. I will veto any legislation that holds this minimum wage increase hostage."

PRIMARY

canceled for two reasons, Thornburgh said.

One was because of a $65 million shortfall in the budget. Canceling the primary would save the state $1.5 million.

"It was a budget decision as opposed to a good government decision," he said.

The second reason concerned the scheduled date of the primary, April 4.

Thornburgh said many thought having a primary at that late of a date would be irrelevant because so many other states, including New York, California and Texas, already would have their primaries, and the winner of the Democratic and Republican nominations would be clear.

Again, Thornburgh said he disagreed with the cancellation.

"It was a shortsighted move that does great damage to voter turnout and the election process," he said. "It's a drastic action to cancel the election. It sends a very strong message out to voters, thanks for your attention, but your votes really are not important."

The Kansas Democratic party wants voters to know that their votes do count. Democratic party chairman Tom Sawyer said the Democrats are going to have their own primary April 29, which is when polling places will be open in each county. However, voters will be able to mail in ballots starting April 8.

Sawyer said his party was upset that the Legislature and governor canceled the presidential primary.

"We think everybody should have the chance to vote for president," he said.

Sawyer said the Legislature's reasoning that April 4 was too late to make a difference on the national front is a cop out.

"They're the ones that took that date," he said. "It's really disingenuous to me when the Legislature says it's too late."

Without a primary, Sawyer said Kansas voters aren't as informed or interested in the presidential election.

"We're kind of left out in the cold in Kansas," he said.

Kansas has a closed primary system, so only Democrats will be able to vote in the primary.

Kansas Republican party executive director Kari Austin said she and the Republican party also were disappointed when Kansas canceled its primary.

"We obviously think that getting voters involved in the presidential election is important," she said.

Vice President Al Gore (left) holds the hand of his wife, Tipper, amid a flurry of confetti celebrating his sweeping presidential primary victories Tuesday in Nashville, Tenn.

Austin said primaries play an important part of getting voters involved.

"It's not a luxury, it's an essential function of government," she said.

Austin said there still is a chance that Kansas could reinstate the primary for this presidential election. She said incumbent majority leader Rep. Kent Glasscock is working with other legislatures to reinstate the primary. If the primary is reinstated, it would not be on April 4, but at a later date.

Austin said if it's clear who will win the Democratic and Republican nominations after the Super Tuesday primaries and next Tuesday's primaries, the Kansas primary will not be reinstated.

Thornburgh said that despite his disappointment about the primary being canceled, some good has come of it. He said the Legislature already has passed a law concerning future primaries.

One part of the law is that Kansas will participate in multistate primaries meaning there will be several other states having their primaries on the same day.

"This adds some strength to the day we do the primary," Thornburgh said.

The second part of the law allows the secretary of state to choose the date.

"This will allow me to negotiate with other states to find the best date possible," Thornburgh said.

Austin said she would like to see a proposal by the state of Delaware become the system for all primaries.

She said Delaware has proposed that all the states be broken down into five territories with 10 states each. They would be divided by population. The 10 smallest states would have their primaries first and then it would continue to the bigger states.

"So New York, Texas and California would be last so all states would count," Austin said. "It would be important to win the smaller states to build momentum."

Whatever the system for primaries, Thornburgh said it's important to have one.

WORCESTER, McCURRY IN RUNOFF

Voter turnout highest since 1976 election

By COLLEGIAN STAFF

All but two of nine student body presidential candidates are finished campaigning. The two tickets receiving the highest vote totals — the Jake Worcester/Dana Pracht and Jesse McCurry/Kylo Heller tickets — will face each other Monday in a runoff election.

Worcester, senior in agricultural economics, said he and running mate Pracht, junior in life sciences, were confident they'd make it to the runoff.

"We've gotten lots and lots of positive response," Worcester said.

Election results echoed the positive response. Worcester and Pracht received 1,229 votes.

Though Jesse McCurry and Kylo Heller received only 555 votes, McCurry, senior in agricultural journalism, said he and running mate Kylo Heller, junior in agronomy, can make up the difference.

"As soon as people find out what we support and what kind of guys we are, we are confident we will get a lot of support," McCurry said.

Travis Morgan, Student Senate elections chair, said he knew there would be a runoff election.

"It was just a matter of who it was going to be," he said.

He said he is excited about what could happen in the days leading up to the runoff, and that he is hopeful that large numbers will cast ballots in the runoff, as they did in the general election, he said.

"This is the highest voter turnout since 1976 that wasn't a referendum vote," he said. There was a 28 percent increase from the past year.

He said the elections wouldn't be finalized until Senate certified them. Morgan said he attributed a lot of the increase to online voting.

"We had a lot of positive feedback on the online voting and how easy it was."

He said 2,759 students voted last year compared to 3,543 this year. He said totals are unofficial, however, and totals for some races don't include all write-in ballots.

"There were some other races where we didn't have an opportunity to incorporate the write-in votes," Morgan said. "We went through and checked, and if they didn't affect the winners, then we didn't worry about them."

In general, Morgan said he was pleased with the results of the election.

"It's been a great year. We've had very minimal problems with violations," he said. "We had a great voter turnout, and we didn't have any conflicts with the candidates."

He said another positive aspect of the election was the break down in off-campus, greek and residence hall students who voted in the election because they are really representative of campus.

Off-campus students cast 1,443 ballots; residence hall students cast 893 and greeks cast 862 ballots. The Elections Committee gathered the numbers from a question on the ballot asking students where they live.

"They voted in a closer proportion to the actual numbers," Morgan said.

McCurry looks to Monday's runoff

By CRISTINA JANNEY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Listening to students is what Jesse McCurry and Kylo Heller said catapulted them into Monday's runoff election.

"We speak our minds and have a good read on what students want," said McCurry, senior in agricultural journalism and political science.

He said they were the pair that was not supposed to be elected. They are both in the same fraternity, both agriculture majors and supposedly don't have a platform.

"We are good candidates, down to earth and real," Heller, junior in agronomy, said.

The candidates made it into the runoff by getting 555 votes, almost 16 percent of the vote. They were substantially behind their runoff opponents, Jake Worcester and Dana Pracht, who received about 35 percent of the vote.

Heller said being different helped their campaign.

"We were fresh faces," he said.

The candidates have gained most of their leadership experience outside of student government. McCurry was elected to one term in Student Senate as a freshman. Both candidates have served in leadership positions in the College of Agriculture and their fraternity.

"We understand our role in the process and how to work with other people," McCurry said.

Instead of rehearsing the same issues that are debated year after year, the candidates tried to branch out.

"We have better ideas for campus," McCurry said. "Our ideas are the most creative in the race."

Some of those ideas include a forum-like hotline for student government, a fall pep rally and better use of cable channel 8, possibly to broadcast Senate meetings live. Campaign manager Robin Cates said she was highly optimistic as she and other supporters waited at Aggieville Pizza Hut for the election results.

She has been involved with presidential races during the five years she has been at K-State. During three of those years, she has been on winning campaigns, and she said she hoped this will be her fourth.

"If you don't address students' needs, you are not going to get elected," she said.

Cates said average students have been eager to bring ideas to the campaign.

"It is so great when you get students to respond, and you hear students say, 'You are addressing our issues,'" she said. "You can't hear anything better than that."

She said students also have been receptive to the realistic campaign platform.

"Every issue on our platform is something we can actually achieve," she said.

Among the group of about 50 supporters, most clad in the navy and red shirts that have come to symbolize the campaign, were McCurry's parents.

Greg McCurry, McCurry's father, said there are no politicians in their family, but politics were always a topic of discussion in their home, which is a farm and ranch near Wichita.

McCurry's father and his mother, Pam, said they were proud and excited for their son.

"He's very proud of the university," Greg McCurry said. "He's really home up here. He really wants to give something back."

The candidates said their fresh ideas and abilities to network and delegate make them the best candidates in the runoff race.

"We have the best ideas and the right attitude to win on Monday," McCurry said.

Worcester campaign collects 35 percent of total ballots

The sidewalk chalkers might have been more nervous than student body presidential and vice presidential candidates Jake Worcester and Dana Pracht.

"I chalked for more than five hours," said Hilary Toll, one of Worcester and Pracht's supporters and senior in life sciences, after expressing her anxiety.

Worcester wasn't quite as nervous. "This has been the calmest I've been in the last three weeks," Worcester, senior in agricultural economics, said.

As time got closer to the announcement, Worcester and Pracht's hands went over their faces a little more often and their eyes went to their watches a little more often.

"The hands on the clock don't seem to go fast enough," Worcester said.

Pracht's anxiety was apparent as she posed for a group photograph.

"If my stomach wasn't in my throat right now, I'd be having a better time," she said.

The nerves were relieved, though, when it was announced that Worcester and Pracht, junior in life sciences and psychology, would be in the runoff election Monday.

"That was good news," Worcester said amid a crowd of about 75 supporters.

Worcester said he and Pracht felt good about where they are at this point, but they still have a long way to go.

"We're not done yet," he said. "We've got five days to put together the support we've had the last three weeks."

Travis Lenkner, campaign manager, handed out fliers to everyone with the "Three keys to a Jake and Dana victory" — get your friends to the polls, help chalk and hang signs and wear your Jake and Dana T-shirt.

Worcester and Pracht will be running against presidential and vice presidential candidates Jesse McCurry and Kylo Heller. Worcester and Pracht won the general election with 1,229 votes, 35.26 percent of the total votes. McCurry and Heller came in second with 555 votes, 15.92 percent of the total votes. In order to win the election outright, a ticket has to have more than 50 percent of the vote.

Pracht said she expected a runoff, since there were nine presidential tickets, and she just hoped she and Worcester would be in it.

"It's one of those things where you can hope, but you never know until it comes right down to it," she said. "We do realize we

Kansas teen pleads guilty to killing 13-year-old boy

OSKALOOSA, Kan. — A 15-year-old boy pleaded guilty Wednesday to charges that he fatally shot a 13-year-old boy in the back of the head, the Jefferson County attorney's office said.

Joshua L. Stark of Oskaloosa pleaded guilty to second-degree murder in the Feb. 27 shooting death of Dakota "Cody" Back, said Vic Braden, assistant county attorney.

In exchange for the guilty plea, the state dropped charges of criminal possession of a handgun, theft of a handgun valued at less than $500, underage consumption of alcohol, possession of marijuana and drug paraphernalia.

Stark will be sentenced April 12 in juvenile court.

At 2:55 a.m. on Feb. 27, the Jefferson County sheriff's office got a 911 call from someone who said a person accidentally had shot himself at the Back home.

Back was in his bedroom with three other boys.

Brothers Joseph Sheley, 18, and Dan Sheley, 16, both students at Oskaloosa High School, pleaded guilty Monday to endangering a child and two counts of contributing to a child's misconduct.

Dan Sheley also pleaded guilty to possession of marijuana and drug paraphernalia and criminal use of a weapon.

Both boys are scheduled to be sentenced April 11.

In addition, Dakota Back's mother, Patricia Back, and Donovan McCleary, a man who also lived in the home, have been charged with endangering a child, possession of marijuana and drug paraphernalia and contributing to a child's misconduct.

Patricia Back was asleep in another room when her son was shot.

She and McCleary are scheduled to make their first appearances in court March 27.

Braden said the child endangerment complaint was filed for placing the victim in a situation where numerous firearms with compatible ammunition and marijuana and drug paraphernalia were readily available and easily accessible.

TV multimillionaire's bride attempts to annul marriage

LAS VEGAS — TV's instant bride has filed for an annulment, saying that her quickie marriage to a multimillionaire was a fraud and that he never mentioned he had a history of problems with women.

Darva Conger said in court papers filed Tuesday that the marriage never was consummated and she and Rick Rockwell barely saw each other on their Caribbean honeymoon.

"Neither the contestants nor the show's producers seriously contemplated creating a proper marriage," she said.

Rockwell, 42, selected Conger, 34, from among 50 contestants on the Fox TV special "Who Wants to Marry a Multimillionaire?"

They married on the spot in Las Vegas during the Feb. 15 show, with more than 22 million viewers tuned in.

Despite the smash ratings, Fox canceled a rebroadcast of the show and swore off a sequel and similar program after it was disclosed that a former fiancée took out a restraining order against Rockwell in 1991 for allegedly hitting and threatening her.

He denied the allegations.

Conger said in court papers that Fox misrepresented Rockwell's personality and background.

Conger said she was unaware that Rockwell had a history of problems with his prior girlfriends and was the subject of at least one restraining order for threatening and dangerous behavior.

Conger had said after returning alone from her honeymoon that she participated in the show on a lark.

She said in court papers that the marriage was a mutual mistake of fact and was entered into solely for an entertainment purpose.

Conger and Rockwell both signed an agreement before the show that they could annul the marriage.

Clark County has no residency requirements to file for an annulment.

KATS enrollment times increase

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Another ritualistic practice is about to begin for most K-State students — enrollment.

Course schedule booklets have been available via the World Wide Web since Feb. 28, and hardcopies will be available at the K-State Student Union beginning Monday.

Gunile DeVault, associate registrar, said enrollment will be March 27 to April 20 and there are several changes concerning enrollment this year. She said instead of three beginning enrollment times for students to enroll on KATS, this year there will be five: at 7 a.m., 10 a.m., noon, 2 p.m. and 4 p.m.

Students will be assigned enrollment times based on the number of credit hours they have completed.

"Students can get on KATS and verify their hours," DeVault said. "Students also need to begin to work with their advisers to develop a schedule and get an idea of what they need to take."

DeVault said it is important for students to meet with their advisers prior to enrolling. She also said to check the course schedule book for instructor approval and to have extra classes in mind in case of course closings.

"Students need to make sure they work with their adviser so they know what they are taking before they actually enroll," DeVault said. "They also need to have alternative classes ready so they have a plan on what they will do if classes close."

Jill Casten, sophomore in agricultural economics, said she already has looked at the online course catalog and has started planning her schedule for next semester. She said her adviser will help her map out her final two years at K-State and will offer good advice as to what classes to take.

"I have already started looking at my program of study and the classes I still need to take and have made an appointment with my adviser," Casten said. "My adviser gives me good suggestions about my career plan and what classes to take."

DeVault also said students will have to be prepared to complete the census form through KATS before they are allowed to enroll through KATS or at the enrollment center in Willard Hall.

"Since Monday, census forms have been available online for students to complete," DeVault said. "If a student has not completed the form, they will not be allowed to enroll."

KATS Beginning Enrollment Times:

DeVault said many students have chosen to enroll through KATS since the system first offered the service in fall 1998. She said the intent is for enrollment to be completely conducted through KATS in the future, but it is not there yet.

"Students like to enroll through KATS mostly because of the convenience," DeVault said. "They can do a little more of their own choosing rather than enrolling during certain hours at the enrollment center."

Casten said she has been enrolling through KATS the past couple of semesters because of its simplicity and its convenience for students.

"By enrolling through KATS, you don't have to stand in line and wait," Casten said. "It's easy and done within five minutes."

Car-jacking incident raises questions concerning parking-lot safety

By ERIN SCHNEWEIS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With the recent incident of car jacking, the question of safety at K-State is brought to the surface.

Gerald Carter, director of facility planning and university architect, said K-State is very safe.

Carter said he is familiar with the other Kansas Board of Regents institutions, the campuses of the Big 12 Conference and other peer institutions.

"In comparison with many, the incidents of significant problems or difficulties are extremely rare on this campus," he said. Things have changed, Carter said, in terms of safety since he was an undergraduate student 30 years ago.

Every year, lights are added to the university after illuminating engineers meter the campus to determine where lights are needed. For the last five to six years, the group has presented the information to the City University Fund to ask for money based on recommendations for the new or replacement of lights.

Carter said the emergency phones, such as the one used by a professor shortly after his car was hijacked two weeks ago, have been a feature on campus for an extremely long time.

Another safety mechanism that is available for students is the Wildcat Walk Escort Service. It is a service that can be used when a K-State student wants accompaniment to their car or their destination. The free service can be obtained by calling 532-7465.

Camera devices in parking lots are another safety feature.

Richard Herrman, university police lieutenant and patrol commander, said several K-State parking lots have security cameras. Herrman said the majority of the cameras were installed in the late 1980s and early 1990s. The cameras are linked to the campus police office. The cameras have monitors and a recording system.

Herrman said that whenever a building or parking lot is renovated, cameras are added to the cost of the building.

University Police Captain Robert Mellgren offered suggestions to night safety on campus.

■ Pay attention to what is going on around you.

■ Try to avoid areas that present itself as a bad location. For instance, edges of parking lots and places with a lot of trees around them.

■ If you can, walk in pairs.

Carter said his suggestions to the students are the same things he tells his daughters - to be aware of the surroundings. He said students should use the common sense items that their parents probably have spent the last 18 to 22 years trying to teach them.

Professor's car stolen from campus

By ERIN SCHNEWEIS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A car jacking involving a K-State professor and two unidentified suspects occurred on K-State's campus two weeks ago.

The incident occurred at 11:50 p.m. February 24 in parking lot A-8, located behind King Hall. The professor has asked to remain anonymous due to safety reasons.

University Police Captain Robert Mellgren said the professor was in the car when an individual approached the automobile. One of the suspects then yanked the professor out of the car and stole the automobile.

After the car jacking incident the professor used a campus emergency phone to report his stolen automobile.

Mellgren said the Manhattan City Police was following a car that was acting suspiciously.

"The city police followed it onto Ivy Circle, off of Kimball Avenue, close to Blue Hills," he said.

When the police stopped the car, two individuals jumped from the car and proceeded to leave on foot. When checking the car, the police officers determined the car had been reported stolen 15 minutes ago. Nothing was reported missing from the car.

So far no arrests have been made.

"We have not been able to definitely identify anyone in that car, as to who the suspects are," Mellgren said. "We don't have enough to make any arrests at this time. We have some leads of individuals who are believed to have been in the car. Since they are suspects, we cannot release their names."

Kansas should re-instate primary election

The presidential primary system needs to be updated.

The current system, which sprinkles primary elections and caucuses over several months, depletes the effects of small states and the likelihood that voters in those states will visit the polls.

In some states, such as Kansas, there is no primary election whatsoever.

The Kansas primary was canceled in 1996 because it widely was believed that Bob Dole and Bill Clinton would receive the state's nomination. It was canceled again this year to save money.

While money certainly is needed elsewhere, canceling primary elections takes away Kansans' only opportunity to voice their opinion on who should be the next president. Because Kansas is so heavily Republican, the state is a shoe-in for the GOP in November.

This year, it is too late to reinstate the primary. George W. Bush and Al Gore have their parties' nominations all but wrapped up, and Kansas hardly has the power to sway those nominations.

However, when 2004 rolls around, a change would be much appreciated by Kansas voters. If the primary was moved earlier in the year — as are the Iowa caucus and New Hampshire primary — Kansans not only would be able to cast their ballots, but they would be in the national spotlight, if only for a brief time.

It is time for state officials to consider creating a primary for the state at the beginning of the primary season.

Until this happens, Kansans will continue to sit happily, with the only national ballot of any significance taken from their hands to save a little money.

OUR VIEW, an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board, is written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

The Collegian's Reader Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on any topic for 20 seconds.

But calling the Fourum is so much easier than voting.

What is Ken Wells doing with all of those rodents?

Josh Kinder, great column on how athletes need to be role models.

All Heinrich did during his presidency is get a bigger head and get even chubbier.

Is Jeffrey mad because no one likes to hear his opinion?

I just want to tell Jeff Elliott that he rocks.

I think Sir Mix-A-Lot said it best when he said, "I like big butts and I cannot lie."

I am glad all the greeks have found out who they're going to be homecoming partners with for next year so they can find out who they can be friends with for the next year.

I love bid week. All of the shoe polish makes it easier to know which cars to key.

I think that fraternity-sorority homecoming bidding does not have anything to do with greek unity. In actuality, it drives the houses apart and causes fights between houses. I don't think that's right for K-State.

I'm glad that after a hard day at school and work and putting up with crappy roommates, I can kick back and relax by reading the Campus Fourum.

I was just curious who has had their picture in the paper more — Nicky Ramage or the people who are always climbing the wall at East Stadium.

Does anybody know about foot fungus? I've got a dandy one.

Thank you, Tony Kitt, for all of your hard work. We'll miss you.

I am a high school student who was planning to attend K-State next year, until Tuesday, when I read the Campus Fourum and got scared.

Why is it that, even if a girl is interested in a guy, she never feels obligated to call him?

Wait a minute. You mean we had a choice not to read your columns, Elliott?

Hey, Elliott. Quit crying and write.

If Taryn Fort is not a New York resident, I don't want to hear her opinion on Hillary Clinton. If she thinks New Yorkers will vote for Clinton simply because she is a woman, I guess Taryn doesn't hold a very high opinion of the intellects of New York citizens.

I used to think all the other schools were chickens for not playing K-State. But now, after Snyder rejected the USC deal, I see who the real chicken is.

Do infants enjoy infancy as much as adults enjoy adultery?

Good job, Scott. I'd like to think there's a little intellectual strife between you and David Levin.

Someday, Jeff Elliott could be working for a major newspaper, like USA Today. Do we really want that to happen?

Netscape 4.06 is hardly archaic. Let's face it: SGA screwed this up, and they're trying to blame it on CNS.

TAKE HEART, FANS: men's team bound to get better

To: A K-State aficionado From: A K-State fan

I feel for you. I really do. You see, I have lived this agonizing basketball season with you.

Let me begin by affirming your belief that you are special.

You are of the group "aficionado," a class of K-State sport society. I know. I am married to one of you. Permit me to share my experience with your set.

You know all the trivia there is to know about K-State football and basketball.

You grew up listening to the games on the radio, instead of playing G.I. Joes or watching "Transformers."

If you are like my husband, when you sort the laundry you have a pile devoted to purple K-State T-shirts. Needless to say, purple is your choice wardrobe color.

At dinner parties, when your girlfriend or wife is trying to improve your social graces, you are determined to recite Kansas/K-State football scores since 1972.

When planning your wedding, you insist that you must honor not only the holy union of marriage, but also K-State, so your fiancée agrees that purple bridesmaid dresses are appropriate.

You listen to or attend Cat Chat. Most importantly, you must not be confused with the group called "fan."

You see, I am a fan. I go to the games. I have my favorite football player (Lamar Chapman — defense was great with you. No one will replace you as my favorite. However, Quincy Morgan, you have the honor of keeping me attentive to the games next season). I wear purple and participate in tailgating activities. But, unlike you aficionados, I don't have a subscription to Powercat Illustrated. Some of my set confuse themselves with your set, but you are quick to weed out the misguided.

You aficionados have suffered quietly this basketball season. You still are true to the game, the players and the school. You support the men's basketball team through thick and thin. If you are like my husband, you are optimistic that next year will be better.

As you sulk in sadness, as you watch March Madness, I have a quote that might lift your spirit.

Elmer E. Bates said, "The advantages of a losing team: 1. There is everything to hope for and nothing to fear. 2. Defeats do not disturb one's sleep. 3. An occasional victory is a surprise and a delight. 4. There is no danger of any club passing you. 5. You are not asked 50 times a day, 'What was the score?'. People take it for granted that you lost."

I think this fits K-State men's basketball pretty well.

1. "There is everything to hope for and nothing to fear." We have seen the worst our team has to offer, and yet, we still love them. So they have bungled a few games. Aren't you hopeful for one made free throw, one possession without a turnover or one win against KU?

2. "Defeats do not disturb one's sleep." Let's face it, after a game you feel frustrated, but you don't lose sleep over it. The only one who could be losing any sleep is head coach Tom Asbury, and I don't think this season is enough even to do that. There always are plenty of coaching jobs.

3. "An occasional victory is a surprise and delight." Don't tell me the win against Texas A&M didn't brighten your spirit. You felt good about basketball until the next game.

4. "There is no danger of any club passing you." I guess in our case it's a team, not a club, but at the bottom there's nothing to do except look up. One less worry.

5. "You are not asked 50 times a day 'What was the score?'. People take it for granted that you lost." Life has been relatively easy this past season for aficionados. You remember all the statistics by associating them with the worst basketball season of your tenure at K-State. Everyone remembers the bad times more easily than the good.

So take this quote to heart as you continue through March. Remember you are a distinct group of people who make K-State sports great. You are the aficionados.

Cheer up. There's always next season.

KELLIE FARRELL/COLLEGIAN

Far-right Christians base beliefs on artificial realities

"The bible is absolutely true ... it follows necessarily that when the understanding of a biblical verse is refuted by proof, [that verse] must be interpreted differently." Moses Maimonides (1135-1204), Jewish philosopher, Rabbinical scholar, physician, noted for using Aristotelian logic to study Jewish scripture.

Many on the Christian far-right create an artificial reality to support their preconceived misconceptions of biblical scripture and their place within society.

After my last column I received many rebuttals from those on the Christian far-right. These individuals supported their position with half-truths, denial of reality or straight-out fabricated rubbish.

In response, I'd like to address some of these fallacious themes perpetuated by this vocal and politically active group.

On trust vs. faith: Scientists often are accused of having faith in science just as some have faith in God. But it's not faith we have in science; it's trust.

In my field of insect cellular immunology, those of us around the world who study this know one another's work extremely well. If anyone working in insect cellular immunology makes an experimental mistake or draws an erroneous conclusion, it will be caught and not allowed to propagate, if for nothing else, to preserve the integrity of the science.

This same sentiment exists within all scientific fields. I know the science coming out of my field is honest. I trust that which emanates from other scientific fields is as well.

On being closed-minded: Those of us who have deduced through logic and reason that the preponderance of scientific evidence supports the theory of evolution often are accused of being closed-minded because we, through logic and reason, refute the rubbish fundamentalists try to use to discredit this theory.

However, the scientific community can have its mind changed as illustrated by the following example:

Astronomers traditionally believed the universe always had existed with no beginning. When the big bang theory first was proposed, the scientific community was extremely resistant to this idea because it smacked too much of biblical creationism. As more evidence supporting the big bang theory grew, reason necessitated the new theory be accepted over the old.

If anyone can derive a better alternative to evolution through logic and reason, I guarantee the scientific community will change its mind.

Fundamentalists start with a bias based on a preconceived misconception from the bible and then try to fit reality into their delusion. Because no amount of logic and reasoning can shake their bias, it is they who are closed-minded.

On Adolph Hitler, the Holocaust and evolution: Some on the Christian far-right claim it was through the study of evolution that led Hitler and the Nazis to commit the Holocaust. This is a complete historical fallacy. Nazi studies supporting the theory of Aryan superiority had no bases in science. The Nazis started with a bias based on the preconceived misconception that Aryans are the supreme race, then tried to fit reality into this delusion. It doesn't take an objective eye to see the Nazi studies were not science but pure crap formulated to feed their self-deception.

Nazi ideology arose from a tradition of Germanic anti-Semitism. As historian Jacob Marcus wrote in his book "The Rise and Destiny of the German Jew," "Religious bigotry, encouraged by the Church and inflamed by the Crusades, became increasingly prevalent and soon led to a series of persecutions and massacres. The tradition of Jew-killing and hatred began as early as 1096 and continued in increasingly violent form."

If anything, the science of evolution demonstrates the variation exhibited among Homo sapiens is superficial at best. Genetically, the differences among humans is less than 0.1 percent. Any honest study of evolution clearly shows we all are the same.

I take great offense to the fundamentalists' deliberate distortion of history. If we as members of the human race are to do our best to prevent genocide, we must have a clear and true understanding of how genocide in the past had come to occur. To propagate misinformation about the Holocaust to support any agenda, be it religious or otherwise, both is hateful and anti-Semitic.

On the assault on Christianity within the United States: It doesn't exist.

How many non-Christian presidents have there been? How many non-Christians are running for president?

Every Sunday, the evening news reports which church each of the presidential candidates went to that morning to pray. I never hear about them going to a mosque or a synagogue. Bush spoke at the Christian, radical far-right Bob Jones University. I do not know of him ever even going to a moderate Jewish or Islamic anything. And if he has, apparently it's not news worthy.

Salina students sleep out for homeless

■ Participants use event to encourage awareness, donations for homeless.

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State-Salina students spent the night outside Wednesday night, but not for an insignificant reason.

They wanted to bring awareness to an ongoing problem in the United States — homelessness.

Nick Sulzen, community service chair for Student Governing Association and freshman in computer information systems technology, said the idea for The Box Village came after he had heard about similar ideas that other universities had organized.

"I think that those in the community need to become more aware of the homeless population," Sulzen said. "It is a fun project to do, and it will help bring awareness to the community."

The more than 20 students who participated in the project created a "village" out of refrigerator boxes near the circle drive west of the entrance to the K-State-Salina campus. The purpose was to simulate what it might be like for those who are homeless in the country.

The project started at 5 p.m. and continued until 8 a.m. this morning. The community also was asked to donate items such as personal hygiene products and nonperishable food.

All donations will be given to the Salina Rescue Mission.

"All of the proceeds and items we collect are going to those who need it at the rescue mission," Sulzen said. "This is a community-service project that is meant to bring awareness to the public about homelessness."

Sulzen said activities such as guest speakers from the Salina Rescue Mission and a movie sponsored by the residence hall association were available for those who participated. A local radio station also gave a live remote, asking the community to give donations.

MIKE SHEPHERD/COLLEGIAN

Mike Higley, freshman in computer information systems, takes a seat inside his home for the night Wednesday at K-State-Salina while his friends Andrew Sedlacek, freshman in airway science, and Nathan Gingles, freshman in airway science, make some last-minute adjustments to theirs. The students spent the night in cardboard boxes to promote awareness for the homeless.

Troy Henderson, freshman in mechanical engineering technology, said the project is important because it will bring attention to homelessness in the community, although it might not seem to be a big issue in Kansas.

"In a town this size, there does not appear to be a high percentage of homeless people," Henderson said. "However, it is always good to bring to people's attention that it is a problem and that we need to raise awareness."

Steve Kmetz, executive director of the Salina Rescue Mission, said he thinks the project is an outstanding idea and will be successful. He said he thinks the community will be behind the service program because of the importance of helping those who might not be able to help themselves.

"I believe that this is a real issue in the country because there are more reasons behind those that are homeless than people realize," Kmetz said. "Salina is a caring community, and the community believes in helping people."

Kmetz said items donated by the community will help with the ongoing maintenance of the shelter. He said all donations will allow any money that is given to the shelter to be used for other things.

Kmetz also said by seeing college students getting together and participating in a community service project, it will show the community that they are being productive in important areas and not doing typical college student activities all of the time.

"If those in Salina see college students who are willing to expend their energy to help a cause, they will be more apt to help in the efforts, too," Kmetz said. "The most positive thing about the program is the students themselves are pursuing this and want to do it on their own. They see a need and want to do something good for Salina and the community."

The Box Village was co-sponsored by K-State-Salina's SGA, the Salina Rescue Mission and the Brotherhood Fraternity.

Both Sulzen and Kmetz said if the program is successful in gathering donations and raising awareness this year, it will be something positive to continue doing in the future.

"I think it is a tremendous idea to continue doing this," Kmetz said. "It would be a great thing to do this project every spring, not only on the Salina campus, but also in Manhattan."

Firefighters, deputy shot, killed in fire in Memphis

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MEMPHIS, Tenn. — Firefighters responding to a house fire Wednesday were ambushed by an off-duty Memphis firefighter who stepped out of the garage and began shooting, authorities said. Two firefighters and a sheriff's deputy were killed, and a woman was found dead in the garage.

The suspected gunman, Fred Williams, was wounded and was undergoing surgery, Police Director Walter E. Crews said. A bystander also was wounded, but not seriously.

Williams had just returned to work as a firefighter this week after an extended leave on disability, Crews said.

"We don't expect this. We're here to fight fires. You want to say it's part of the job, but it's not," Memphis Fire Chief H.J. Pickett said.

Williams did not live in the house, and his relationship to the woman found dead in the garage was unclear, Crews said. Authorities also were uncertain how the woman was killed and whether the fire was set to cover up her death.

Firefighters were called to the home just before 1 p.m. When they arrived, witnesses said, a man came out of the garage firing a shotgun and shouting, "Get away! Get away!"

Firefighters Lt. Javier Lerma and Pvt. William Blakemore were killed. Sheriff's Deputy Rupert Peete was shot in his patrol car as he responded to the report of the shooting; authorities said. His car crashed through a fence and ended up next to the house.

Memphis police officers then arrived and tried to get the gunman to put down his weapon. When he refused, "one of our officers got into a gun battle and the suspect was shot," Crews said.

The shootings occurred in a prosperous neighborhood of mostly one-story brick houses and well-kept yards at the edge of the city. A golf course is a few miles away.

Before firefighters arrived, neighbors reported seeing smoke coming from the house and alerted the suspect, but he said everything was fine, according to authorities. Soon after, deputies and firefighters arrived and were ambushed.

"It's a tragic thing for the city and for the families. The firemen, police, they put their lives on the line a lot, but they don't expect to be shot at the scene of a burning house," President Clinton said during interview with CNN.

The fire was put out within a couple of hours.

When you're hurting or confused (or even when you're not):

ARE YOU AWARE OF WHAT CULTS CAN DO?

LEARN TO BE A QUESTIONER

When you feel alone and lonely—

When you feel totally overwhelmed by a decision you need to make and find yourself wishing that someone would just tell you what to do—

When you feel like the world used to make sense and now everything's falling apart around you—

YOU'RE VULNERABLE TO CULT-LIKE GROUPS!

The Kansas State University Campus Ministers want you to be aware of the risks you face.

... of people with instant answers.
[Life is usually more complex than they are willing to admit.]

... of inappropriately friendly people.
[There are no instant friendships.]

... Of groups that pressure you because "everyone else is doing it."
[No one knows what's right for you except you and those who know you best.]

... of groups that recruit you through guilt.
[Guilt induced by others is rarely a productive emotion.]

... Of invitations to isolated weekend workshops having nebulous goals.
[There's no need to be vague unless there is something to hide.]

... Of those who demand instant decisions.

TIPS FOR DEALING WITH CULT-LIKE GROUPS

- 1) Learn how to interpret the Bible responsibly.
- 2) Ask for the name of the group.
- 3) Ask if their group is registered as a student group with the university.
- 4) If you are already involved in a religious organization on campus, talk to your campus minister.
- 5) If you are harassed, contact the Office of Student Life at 532-6432.

If you know someone who feels alone, who feels overwhelmed by decisions, or feels his or her world is falling apart, take the responsibility to help that person. When people are hurting (or even when they are not), people need people. Help them reach out to someone they trust.

Cats to face Jayhawks in 1st round of Big 12 Tournament

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — For the third straight year, the K-State Wildcats will play Kansas in the Phillips 66 Big 12 Tournament.

Rebounding is what head coach Tom Asbury said will be key to the No. 12 seed Wildcats' chances of a victory against the No. 5 seed Jayhawks at 2:20 p.m. today at Kemper Arena.

"Any of the really good teams, and we've got a number of them in the league, you have to do a lot of things well," Asbury said. "But if I had to select things against Kansas that we'll have to do, it would be handle their pressure defense and rebound the basketball. Rebounding is huge for us."

No. 24 Kansas (22-8, 11-5) is plus 17 in rebounds head-to-head against K-State (9-18, 2-14) this season.

In the first edition of the Sunflower Showdown in Lawrence on Jan. 12, K-State was outboarded by just one and lived to put up a fight in the second half, despite being defeated 87-79.

In the second meeting, K-State was humiliated at home 94-65, a game in which Kansas collected 51 boards to K-State's 35 and handing the Cats' their worst loss ever to Kansas.

Kansas averages nearly 46 rebounds per game, while K-State posts 37 per contest. K-State senior forward Tony Kitt leads the Cats and is third in the conference in rebounds with nine a game.

"The last few games of the season, we've really cut our turnovers down, and that's what got us trouble the last two times we've played them," senior forward Josh Reid said. "Our rebounding could be a little bit better, but hopefully we'll be crashing the boards tomorrow."

"They have a great rebounding team."

Kansas' rebounding can be attributed to 6-foot-9-inch freshman forwards Drew Gooden and Nick Collison, who average 7.6 and 6.8

boards per game, respectively. Also crashing the boards for Kansas is 7-foot-1-inch junior center Eric Chenoweth, who averages six per game, despite losing his starting position midway through the season.

However, leading the way for the Hawks is junior guard Kenny Gregory, who averages 13 points per game.

The Hawks this year clearly are not the same team that has come to dominate the Big 12 in the past. But Asbury, who has never beaten Kansas, said he refuses to believe the Hawks are not able to win the tournament.

"I don't think I would necessarily agree that this team is down," Asbury said. "This team is young. I think they're deep, and I think that on a given night they're an excellent team. They could win this thing. Will they? I don't know. Can they? Sure they can."

"Now, maybe some of the guys who they anticipated being their marquee players didn't ultimately end up to be that way."

"But when you look at the kind of impact that Collison, Gooden and (Kirk) Hinrich have had on that team, I still think they are a very solid team."

Despite posting the conference's worst record this season, which also was the worst in the past 54 years at K-State, Asbury said he feels confident going into what could prove to be the final stake driven through the Cats this season.

Asbury hinted that K-State's motivation of possibly knocking off a conference powerhouse might be enough of an edge against a team that knows they will live to play another day.

"We all know that anything can happen in these post-season tournaments," Asbury said.

"The teams in the upper echelon or the teams that got into the mid-20s as far as wins are concerned, they're going to get into the NCAA Tournament, and sometimes the incentive isn't the same."

"It's a crazy game. Anything can happen."

KSU enters 3-game series with Huskers

By MIKE VIETTI
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Call it bad luck. Call it bad fortune, or call it a lack of concentration.

Depending on who's speaking, there are different reasons as to why K-State (4-11 overall, 0-6 Big 12) hasn't been getting any breaks on the diamond as it enters a three-game series with Nebraska (8-5, 1-2) at home starting today at 2 p.m.

For some reason, errors keep happening at precisely the wrong time, and when they do, they turn out to sting the Cats deep.

"This right now might be the unluckiest team I've ever been around as far as breaks going our way and calls going our way," head coach Mike Clark said. "Every time we make a mistake, it seems like it leads to a four-run inning."

Hitting coach Robbie Moen offered another opinion.

"It's just a lack of concentration. It's something where the play was too easy and they just kind of took it a little bit for granted," Moen said. "Whenever you do that in the game of baseball, the baseball gods come back and get you, and I'm a firm believer in that."

Clark's description of Oklahoma's four-run seventh inning in Friday's 6-4 loss hammers the point home even further.

"We dropped a fly ball in center field. The next guy gets a single and we do a great job — we get the guy in a rundown between first and second, get him out for the second out of the inning," Clark said.

"They still got a runner at third base

Cats Cruise to VICTORY

K-State readies for tourney this weekend after 16-4 win

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State baseball team scored runs in bunches Wednesday. It got started early in its 16-4 defeat of Central Christian.

It was a win that moved K-State to 4-10 on the season, and it can serve as a tune-up for this weekend's three game series with Nebraska.

The Cats jumped to an early lead by scoring four runs in the first inning, and they looked to be cruising.

"I thought our hitters did an excellent job of hitting balls all over the field," K-State head coach Mike Clark said.

From the hill, the Cats were receiving strong pitching from starter Derek Ver Helst, who pitched three innings and had seven strikeouts.

However, in the fourth inning, Ver Helst yielded the mound to Chad Duckers, who struggled in his first inning. He allowed four runs on four hits, and Central Christian was tied at 4.

It didn't take long for the Cats to get back on top, though. In the next inning K-State scored four runs on three hits and had one error. It was an inning in which K-State took advantage of walks, and second baseman Chad Tabor knocked in two runs with a double.

K-State continued to score at will, and the Cats' bullpen, which has struggled this season, kept firm. In the contest, K-State was able to continue to score runs by adding three runs in the sixth and seventh innings and two more in the eighth.

The Cats made wholesale changes throughout the game, such as switching fielders and realigning those playing the field.

Asbury says he will not resign at completion of season

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — K-State men's basketball coach Tom Asbury said Wednesday that he will not resign following the season with a to-the-point "No."

This means that if Asbury is not retained, K-State's only option is to fire him and buy out the remaining two years on his contract.

Asbury, who has been head coach of the Wildcats for the past six seasons, suffered his third losing season, which also was the worst at K-State since the 1954 season under the guidance of Fritz Knorr.

The Cats, who open play in the Phillips 66 Big 12 Tournament against Kansas today, have the conference's worst record at 9-18 overall and 2-14 in conference play. K-State lost 11 straight games from Jan. 12 to Feb. 19. In fact, the Cats have lost 14 of their last 15 games overall.

Asbury also is the first coach since Knorr to have an overall losing record at K-State at 85-87, despite ranking fifth in school history in wins.

When asked if he would be the coach at K-State next season, he was unsure.

"I don't know, quite simply," Asbury said. "You're actually asking the wrong person. I don't make those decisions."

The one who would make those decisions is Athletic Director Max Urick, who has said all along that a decision would be made when the season is over.

"They indicated that they were going to wait till the season is over and we'd sit down and evaluate the situation at that time," Asbury said. "We have an evaluation at the end of the year, critiquing the past year and what our needs are, and what our strengths and weaknesses were. That's very consistent with what's gone on previous years."

Despite the ongoing rumors concerning Asbury's future at K-State, he said he and his staff will continue to recruit for next season.

"We will recruit till we're told not to recruit," Asbury said.

With the possibility of Asbury's exit, one would have to worry about the success of the whole recruiting process — considering there more than likely would be a revamping of coaching staffs and philosophies.

"They've (recruits) asked questions certainly like you would expect them to," Asbury said. "Certainly there is concern, but when a young man signs, they're signing with the institution."

Rush's overtime performance exemplifies tradition of college basketball champions

Champions step up in clutch situations. And for the UCLA Bruins, JaRon Rush proved no exception.

With three seconds left in overtime, Rush hit a 12-foot baseline jumper last Saturday to pull UCLA (17-11, 8-8) to a 94-93 upset over top-ranked Stanford (24-2, 14-2).

I admit that my views toward college basketball have become somewhat marred (OK, they literally were shattered at one point) after witnessing the K-State men's basketball team play this year.

But Rush's heroics are typical of the strong tradition of excellence that John Wooden established in the UCLA basketball program decades ago.

Dynasties. They're the epitome of what college basketball is all about, and Rush's performance follows suit in the long line of talented UCLA athletes.

They include last-second shots to win ball games that are memories frozen in time. They're what inebricated fans relish every time their team takes the court.

Most of all, I think it was great to see Rush back on the court. What a fitting return for one of the NCAA's young phenoms.

Many of you are wondering what return I'm talking about. Well, for those of you who choose not to follow the college basketball scene, here's the breakdown.

The win over Stanford was Rush's first game back since Dec. 1, as he was suspended for the previous 24 games by the NCAA.

In fact, Rush wasn't even expected to play again this season, because he originally was slapped with a whopping 44-game suspension, consisting of two separate violations. Twenty-nine of those games were issued because the sophomore took money from his former summer league coach and sports agent.

That suspension was reduced Feb. 28 to nine games by the NCAA's Subcommittee on Student-Athlete Reinstatement, following an appeal filed by UCLA.

Rush also served a 15-game suspension this season for accepting a measly $200 from an agent last season.

So in the end, Rush only had to serve a total of 24 of the 44 game suspensions to which he originally was sentenced.

At least the kid got off easier than some people (like what's expected to be dealt to Auburn's Chris Porter). But I think it's those dim-witted sports agents who need to be tracked down. They are the ones taking advantage of the young, naive basketball players to fatten their pocketbooks. Then, in turn, they end up getting some of college basketball's greatest players suspended, to the dismay of fans across the country.

It's a privilege to watch college athletics at its best, and when agents take that right away from me by giving money to players, it aggravates me. I just thought, what if Rush still would've been suspended through the Stanford game?

What would have been the outcome of the game in that event? In my opinion, UCLA would have been run all over the floor. Two weeks ago, when UCLA had lost six of its past seven games at one point, the chances of a victory over No. 1 Stanford seemed slim at best.

With only a 68-65 loss to Arizona two months ago on their record, the Cardinal was leading the nation in margin of victory at 21.6 points per game heading into the UCLA contest. In fact, they had won the past 13 games by double-digits, including the previous five by an average of 36.4 points.

However, it became evident that Rush's return gave UCLA the added intensity to win the ball game.

Rush didn't start in the game, but when the Cardinal took a commanding 18-4 lead early on, Bruin head coach Steve Lavin substituted the sophomore into the game.

Rush's first shot — a three-pointer — created a wave of momentum that led to a 23-9 UCLA run, knotting the score at 27 apiece.

Then, as the game wound down, Rush stepped up and launched a bomb from well-beyond the three-point arc with 42 seconds left to cut the Stanford advantage to one. We all know what happened next, and with two outs and the guy hits one off the end of his bat 40 feet — nobody has a play. Full swing — it was the best bunt you could ever drop except it's full swing, so we don't have anybody charging and it's in no man's land, so the run scores," Clark said.

"The next guy doubles down the right field line and hits chalk. The guy's swing was so bad he gets a base hit out of it. If he had made a little better contact, it's an easy ground ball. The next guy gets up and hits one to the opposite field that lands on the chalk," Clark said. "That's just baseball. That's why it's a great game and can frustrate you so much."

Unearned runs aside, K-State outscored Oklahoma in two of the three games but still lost all three. However, the law of averages says this can't go on for much longer.

"The breaks will turn and we'll start getting our fair share. In fact, the percentages are with us pretty good for the rest of the season," Clark said, "but we have to keep a good attitude through all of this so that when the situation does swing the other way, we can take advantage of it."

the game was sealed for the Bruins, giving the team their first victory over a top-ranked opponent since defeating North Carolina 89-84 in 1986.

According to the Associated Press, Lavin was elated to have Rush back on the floor for the Bruins.

"Individually, I was happy for JaRon on a personal level," Lavin told the AP, "because he's gone through so much this year—a 24-game suspension and the basketball taken away from him for the first time in his life. And for him to hit a buzzer shot at Stanford in overtime couldn't have been a better scripted kind of finish for JaRon."

Rush, UCLA's top rebounder and second leading scorer from last season, notched a team-high 19 points on 7-of-10 shooting from the field and 3-of-5 from three-point range in just 26 minutes of action.

Just goes to show the difference a young champion can make for a team, especially since it was only Rush's fourth game this season in a Bruin uniform.

I think the victory on national television should give UCLA a significant boost in its bid for a berth in the NCAA Tournament. Now, the Bruins are prime to make their run toward the "Big Dance," with only Washington State (6-20, 1-15) and Washington (10-18, 5-11) left on the schedule. With Rush leading them, anything is possible. The sophomore had impressive modesty after the Stanford game. He gave the credit to the Bruin coaching staff and his fellow teammates. I think the kid's got his head on straight — he'll develop into a powerhouse in the NCAA over the next two seasons.

At least Rush has taken the liberty of providing a glimpse of greatness in a college basketball world that has seemed so inferior to seasons of old.

NBA to coaches: Wear microphone or be fined

By CHRIS SHERIDAN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Pat Riley escaped a fine for refusing to wear a microphone during Sunday's Heat-Lakers game on NBC. The next coach to do so won't be treated so lightly. Fines will start at $100,000.

Despite a chorus of complaints from coaches, the league decided Wednesday to push ahead with its new policies on the wearing of microphones and the use of an unmanned camera in locker rooms during nationally televised games.

Any coach who refuses to wear a microphone will be fined a substantial amount.

"That's substantial with a capital S," league spokesman Brian McIntyre said.

The league has been asking coaches to wear microphones during selected national broadcasts this season, and the compliance rate has been less than 100 percent. Riley refused to wear one, saying he would feel inhibited, and Utah coach Jerry Sloan said he'll "get my throat cut fighting it."

Other coaches, including Jeff Van Gundy, Randy Wittman, Phil Jackson and Larry Bird, have expressed serious reservations about microphones and cameras.

Players, too, have said they would be uncomfortable knowing their movements and actions were being watched — even if most of what was recorded never made it onto television.

"I won't get into a public debate with individual coaches. All I can say is the rule is in place," deputy commissioner Russ Granik said. "I don't want to belittle their concerns, but it has been determined that this is how we want the business to go."

The new policy on fines will go into effect next weekend.

The teams, not the individual coaches, would be responsible for paying the fine, a league spokesman said.

Television ratings are down 14 percent from last season on NBC and 18 percent on TNT and TBS, and the league is eager to try new technology that might enhance

"We're a family, and it would be like sitting at the family dinner table with a mike. It's kind of like invading space as far as our little family goes."

telecasts.

Portland Trail Blazers coach Mike Dunleavy already has worn a microphone for an NBC telecast and said he felt somewhat inhibited in what he said to his players in the huddle.

"It takes away a little of the naturalness. Guys know they're being listened to, I think it inhibits them and me from saying things they need to say — sometimes positive things and sometimes negative things," Dunleavy said.

Coaches have been assured by the league that inappropriate remarks will not be aired during broadcasts and that the cameras and microphones will not be used to divulge strategy.

Dunleavy and Van Gundy said they had a problem knowing that someone, somewhere, would be listening to the raw feed or watching what the camera sees in some control room or production truck.

"They told me they're going to keep that stuff in their archives," Dunleavy said.

A league memo said the unmanned camera only would be used briefly to give viewers a feel of what an NBA locker room looks like during a normal halftime or pregame team meeting.

Still, some players are uncomfortable with giving up a piece of their privacy.

"We're a family," Latrell Sprewell of the Knicks said, "and it would be like sitting at the family dinner table with a mike. It's kind of like invading space as far as our little family goes."

"What if someone sees me half-naked?" Portland's Detlef Schrempf said.

The players union has requested a meeting with league officials to discuss the policies, and union director Billy Hunter said a grievance could be filed if the union feels that the league is unilaterally changing working conditions.

"Our position is they just can't implement this stuff," Hunter said. "What are you going to see, a bunch of guys sitting around a locker room?"

"What purpose does that serve? I don't see where it has a great benefit. The detriment offsets the benefit."

ever reason, you're still going to that institution."

Senior forward Tony Kitt said things have been business as usual for the Cats, despite the off-the-court rumors regarding Asbury.

"We haven't done anything at practice differently since I've been here," Kitt said. "They (coaches) don't bring that stuff to practice."

"We've been working hard, and the coaches have been working hard to prepare all season. I do think the losing streak was blown out of proportion, though. We've all been trying to win."

At the end of the eighth inning, the game was cut short due to the run rule.

Duckers picked up the victory for the Cats in relief, and the game also was Clark's 350th career victory at K-State.

The win snapped the school's losing streak, and it positions them for their weekend series with Nebraska. Clark said he was pleased to get another opportunity to play. "It was a nice win," Clark said. "It was nice to have it going into the Nebraska series this weekend."

Claeys campaign ends with 3rd place in polls

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nervous chatter lowered into a silence at Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon when Jeremy Claeys, junior in electronic journalism, and Amy Metzinger, sophomore in agricultural economics, awaited the results for next year's student body president and vice president.

They received 423 votes out of 3,485, coming in third. Claeys and Metzinger looked at each other and shrugged disappointedly while supporters gathered around them.

"We worked really hard, and we're proud of our campaign," Claeys said. "We know K-State will choose who's best."

Neither Claeys nor Metzinger said who they would support in the runoff, although Claeys said he hopes some issues are addressed.

"I hope that they will address minority representation and come up with new and innovative ways to keep tuition affordable," he said. "No matter who wins, K-State will be represented well."

Claeys will be a senior next year and will not run again, and although Metzinger is a sophomore, she said this was her first and last attempt.

"It's a once-in-a-lifetime kind of deal," she said. "If I did it again, I would analyze it too much and not enjoy it as much."

Both said they enjoyed campaigning because of the two goals they set out to accomplish: to work as a positive team and not talk down on another campaign or person, Metzinger said.

The hardest thing was trying to coordinate campaigning with her job and with classes, she said.

"It kept me really busy," she said. "I need that kind of structure."

Metzinger said she would have preferred to be busy at home and not with the campaign when learning the election results.

"It wouldn't hurt my feelings if I opened the paper and saw the results tomorrow," she said. "It would be less stressful."

They chose Chance to hear the final results.

"It has a tradition at K-State. A lot of people, when they think K-State, they think Rusty's," Claeys said. "It's an icon."

Prior to the results, both candidates were relieving stress by playing foosball and keeping a confident attitude despite the wait.

Online voting changes everything, so one really can't speculate, Claeys said.

"I think we have a really good campaign," he said. "We enjoyed the race. Let K-State pick the people that will best represent them."

Metzinger said she was proud of what they had accomplished despite the results of the elections.

"I think that I gave it 100 percent the whole time, and whatever happens, happens," she said. "I'm trying to keep foosball on my mind, anything besides the elections."

Both said they still will be involved in student government.

Claeys is on the Board of Student Publications, and Metzinger is an agriculture senator and the student government intern coordinator.

Supporters said they were glad Claeys and Metzinger had important campaign issues.

"We've had our ups and downs. I think overall, it's been a great campaign," said Naomi McHugh, sophomore in elementary education and the candidates' volunteer coordinator. "No matter what, it's been a great experience for them."

Ann Riordan, senior in music, said she hopes whoever gets elected will address some of their campaign issues.

"It's disappointing. It was a good campaign," she said. "I hope it raises some awareness, if not on campus, then with the candidates."

Pairing breathes sigh of relief

By JAMIE BARRETT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A sigh of relief, but also of slight disappointment, was the response of Justin Gunter and Matt Kelso on Wednesday night at Scoreboard in Aggieville.

Gunter, junior in mechanical engineering, and Kelso, junior in architectural engineering, said even though they lost the election for student body president and vice president to the runoff candidate pairs of Jake Worcester and Dana Pracht and of Jesse McCurry and Kylo Heller, they were glad they participated in the election.

"What we did was set out to make some waves," Gunter said, "and I think that we succeeded in that."

Gunter and Kelso came in fourth place with 362 votes, which was 10.38 percent of the total votes.

Gunter and Kelso said they started their "We Care About Your Ass" campaign with the idea that they would make a difference for the students.

Their campaign flourished throughout the elections, they said, because they ran on a platform of issues they believed they could accomplish.

"We ran on issues that we could actually stand up to," Kelso said.

"So many of the people ran on issues they could never actually accomplish," he said.

After hearing that Worcester/Pracht and McCurry/Heller are the runoff tickets, Gunter and Kelso said they would not endorse either of them.

"We didn't really like either of them," Kelso said. "The only candidates we would have endorsed if they had won would have been (Rick) Wooten and (Aaron) Shea."

Gunter and Kelso said the entire election process was a learning experience.

"We are really glad that we did it," Gunter said. "We learned quite a bit, and even though our platform was about toilet paper, we did know about the actual issues and did have a clue what we were talking about."

Kelso said with better planning and a stronger stance on some issues, they could have put up a strong fight for the positions.

"If we had the money, resources and had put some more planning into the whole thing, we could have put up a much better fight," Kelso said.

Gunter said although they had set out to make people laugh, they put their all into their campaign.

"We didn't lie to anyone," Gunter said. "We stood on a platform of things that we thought we could do and didn't spend money because we didn't have that much to spend."

In the wake of it all, though, Gunter and Kelso said they are not sure if they would do it again.

"We will talk about it some more and see if next year is a possibility for us," Gunter said.

For now, Gunter and Kelso said they want students to think about their choices for student body president and vice president.

"When everyone is sitting in their cars, waiting to find a parking spot while their tuition is still increasing and they have a chafed ass, they can wonder why they did not vote for us," Kelso said.

Candidates not surprised by defeat

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The presidential candidates who ran as something different met defeat a second time Wednesday night when the results were announced for the K-State student body elections.

Rick Wooten, senior in broadcasting and presidential candidate, and his running mate, Aaron Shea, senior in secondary education, watched with interest from the Aggie Lounge when results began at 8:30 p.m.

"Get to the point, man," Wooten moaned toward the television as the anchors discussed the campaign instead of the election results.

Once the Jake Worcester/Dana Pracht and Jesse McCurry/Kylo Heller campaigns were announced as runoff candidates, Wooten said he wasn't terribly surprised he and Shea lost, but they still added to issues for all candidates.

Wooten and Shea campaigned on issues such as campus beautification and more diversity in student government, but their stance on campaign finance was one raised by all nine tickets during the campaign.

Shea said it was a compliment to see their issues being taken up by other candidates.

If it hadn't been for him and Shea, Wooten said, the TV anchors wouldn't have discussed limits on campaign spending.

The running mates said their total budget totaled $13 for papers and chalk, donating the other $80 to the Women's Crisis Center.

Now, Wooten and Shea said they would endorse the McCurry/Heller campaign for the runoff election because the candidates are not Worcester and Pracht.

"I see him as a continuation of (Jason) Heinrich," Wooten said of Worcester. "We're against status quo, basically. Status quo didn't work."

Shea said they are going to throw their support behind the campaign that seems more dedicated to the students themselves.

"They're outsiders like us," he said.

Wooten said he also plans to begin a petition directly against Heinrich's proposal for a smoking ban in Manhattan bars.

Wooten and Shea ran for the same offices last year, taking fifth place among seven candidates with 140 votes of the 2,841 total votes. Now, Wooten said he simply wanted to know where he and Shea placed in total votes this time.

"At this point, we don't know if we're two votes from the second place," Wooten said. "I think we spent less per vote we got than anybody."

Wooten and Shea came in seventh place out of nine candidates this race, with 182 votes at 5.22 percent.

Kenny Titus, senior in political science who was at the bar when results were announced, said he voted for the two because he wanted common sense in government. But he said he wasn't surprised by the loss.

"Pretty much money wins all elections, like in the national arena," he said.

Teach, Burkin disappointed with results, endorse no one in runoff

By LYNNE HERMANSEN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Disappointment settled over Lucky BrewGrille on Wednesday evening.

As election results were given, student body presidential candidate Jared Teach, junior in public relations, and vice presidential candidate Stan Burkin, junior in human resource management, shook their heads in disbelief.

"You have to know there is a chance that you won't win," Teach said. "But part of you hopes that you will."

The two said they have nothing against the other candidates and nothing critical to say about them.

"We are disappointed by the outcome, but the other two teams who are in the runoff are good," Teach said. "They're capable of the job."

Teach and Burkin received 223 votes, 6.39 percent of the total votes. They were the sixth-highest vote getters.

Now that election campaigning has ended for the two, they said they plan to focus on their classes and talking to candidates about their issues.

They said that by voicing their opinions to the next student body president and vice president, their voices still will be heard.

"We want the candidates that are left to know how important our issues are," Teach said. "So, if we talk to them, perhaps they will listen, and we can still contribute."

Teach and Burkin had no comment about which candidates they would support for the runoff elections. Teach and Burkin said they support the candidates' issues but are unsure if they have the right to support a candidate publicly.

"We would rather not say who we are going to support. It's up to the people, for the students at K-State to decide," Teach said.

This year's presidential campaign has been a learning experience for the team.

"We learned how to improve our campaign," Burkin said. "We will continue to have high expectations for next year's elections."

Teach and Burkin said money played a factor in the election results.

"We didn't spend all the money that we probably could have," Teach said. "People just didn't read into it."

Teach and Burkin made T-shirts, spending about $750 in their total campaign. The team did not promote itself with fliers, posters or sidewalk chalk.

"Maybe if we had made posters and such, more students would have known who we were," Teach said. "But that's not what we were about."

Future goals include changing their approach for the next elections. The two hope to have a better outcome next year.

"We went all-out in the beginning of the race, and things kind of faded off towards the end," Teach said. "Next time around, we will change that from happening."

Even if disappointment was felt by the team, both Teach and Burkin said they had fun campaigning.

"We had a good time," Burkin said. "It does suck, but once again it was a learning experience."

Candidates look toward next year's election, homework deadlines

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Amid the fervor of Homecoming bidding at the Delta Chi fraternity house, Steve Hall, junior in agricultural economics, and Ryan Hoskinson, senior in education, received the final results of the student body presidential and vice presidential election.

The results were disappointing, with the 284 votes the Hall/Hoskinson ticket received not enough to put the pair in next week's runoff election.

"This is too bad, because they would have represented every major and every college fairly," Danette Gaitros, junior in marketing, said.

Hall said he and his running mate learned a lot during their weeks of campaigning.

"The election has taught me that the students really do want better representatives," he said. "They want someone who understands that student issues are more important than politics on campus."

The Student Governing Association still will have Hall and Hoskinson around in lesser roles in the coming months. Hall said he hopes to keep up his involvement with the SGA as an at-large chairman for the Academic Affairs Committee. Hoskinson also said he was hoping for an at-large position in the future but was looking forward to catching up on non-political activities he missed out on during the campaign season.

"I haven't been to the grocery store in a month," Hoskinson said.

Hall said he and Hoskinson would support Jesse McCurry and Kyo Heller in the runoff election for student body president and vice president due to the respect he and his running mate had for the McCurry/Heller ticket.

"They have issues that are very similar to the 'Students for Students' campaign," Hoskinson said.

As Hall and Hoskinson shook hands with and accepted condolences from campaign supporters after checking election results, they discussed plans for the rest of the week.

Hoskinson said he was preparing to finish two papers due for today's classes. Hall said he also was swamped with homework, with more than 60 pages of reading waiting.

Even with a new day of classes looming, they said elections for the year 2001 also were on their minds. Hall said he had considered trying again next year; Hoskinson said he and a friend also had discussed running together.

"Well, we had a second-time candidate this year," Hall said. "Next year will bring what next year will bring."

Steve Hall, junior in agricultural economics and animal science, and Ryan Hoskinson, senior in education and math, try to relax Wednesday evening at the Delta Chi house before the announcement of the student body president and vice president. The elections now will progress to a runoff election between Jake Worcester/Dana Pracht and Jesse McCurry/Kyo Heller on Monday.

Duo expresses concerns over coverage

By FRANK FLATON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Chris Brooks, junior in business administration, and Andrew Miller, sophomore in mechanical engineering, wanted badly to represent K-State as student body president and vice president, but they finished in eighth place of nine candidates.

Nevertheless, Brooks and Miller said that if circumstances were different, the outcome of the election could have favored them.

Brooks and Miller's campaign, "We Got Issues," tallied just 3.85 percent of the vote, but they said they thought financial expenditures and news media coverage hindered their chances for winning.

"We're a little disappointed," Brooks said. "But, we really didn't put a whole lot into it. We were just having fun with it. It was a good time."

Brooks and Miller campaigned by using traditional methods, including chalk and banners in Aggieville, but they spent only $329.25 on their campaign, the third-lowest amount of the nine candidates' budgets.

"The amount of finances had a lot to do with it," Brooks said. "If we had the income, we could have gotten our name out. But, we didn't feel we had to spend that much."

Brooks said he was satisfied with his campaign and would have done just one thing differently if he had the chance to run for president again.

"To tell you the truth, if I had the chance to do it all over again, I wouldn't have showed up to the 15-minute interview with the Collegian," he said.

Brooks said the March 6 Collegian Editorial Board's decision to endorse Jesse McCurry for president damaged his chances for victory.

In the editorial, which briefly commented on each candidate, the board said "these two candidates (Brooks and Miller) had no business jostling for top spots in student government" and "the candidates showed limited knowledge of campus affairs and presidential duties."

"If you're going to endorse a candidate, that's fine then, endorse one. But don't put out negative comments towards the other candidate."

"It's not right to do that when the Collegian is one of the only places for the voters to see information on the candidates."

Supporter Bryan Crow, junior in English, said Brooks and Miller would have represented the student body well.

"Miller would pretty much do anything for anybody, and Brooks is one of the most outstanding gentlemen," he said. "They would have gotten the job done no matter what."

Despite the defeat, Miller said he wasn't surprised with Jesse McCurry and Jake Worcester's success in the elections.

"I told Brooks before the announcement that if we weren't in the runoff, it would have to be those two," he said.

The candidates said they would not endorse McCurry or Worcester, but they would have endorsed Rick Wooten and Aaron Shea, who finished seventh with 5.22 percent of the vote, if that ticket had won the election.

Election night wasn't a complete disappointment for Brooks. The presidential candidate was elected to the College of Business Administration's council for the second straight year.

"We did get to know a lot of the other candidates, and we got to spend a lot of time with them," he said.

Student body vice presidential candidate Ali Karimi gestures at the television Wednesday night as the results of the election are read. Supporters of Drew Maenche and Karimi's campaign gathered at Auntie Mae's Parlor for the announcements.

Pairing fears little change from results

By TANNER EHMKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Despite the long hours of meeting students and running a grassroots campaign with an $11 budget, Drew Maenche and Ali Karimi's efforts did not win them the bid for student body president and vice president.

"I feel 100-percent cheated and robbed blind," Karimi, junior in electronic journalism, said. "Other candidates bought the election."

The candidates who won spent the equivalent of a semester's tuition in a two-week period, Maenche, junior in electronic journalism, said. The entire election was based on name recognition, he said.

Maenche and Karimi said they are convinced there will be little change about how things will be run in the future. However, their support goes to the Jesse McCurry/Kyo Heller ticket.

"We endorse McCurry and Heller because their ideas are more innovative and geared to students compared to Worcester and Pracht," Karimi said. "Jake and Dana are simply out of touch. They ran a dry campaign based on chalk, T-shirts and signs. They're résumé builders."

Maenche and Karimi also commended the Rick Wooten/Aaron Shea, Justin Gunter/Matt Kelso and Steve Hall/Ryan Hoskinson tickets for running honest campaigns.

"They ran for the students and ran the least-political campaigns," Karimi said.

The pair was upset with the endorsement of candidates by the Collegian Editorial Board. The newspaper editorial supported certain candidates based on a short interview, Maenche said.

"The less people spent, the less support they got from the newspaper," Maenche said. "It was not an unbiased decision at all."

According to the vote total of all the candidates, their campaign spent 11 cents per vote, while Worcester spent $2.50 per vote and McCurry spent $4.50 per vote, Karimi said. This was evidence of the need to make campaign finance reform an issue, he said.

Dan Lang, junior in computer science who voted for the pair, said Maenche and Karimi really wanted to make a change on campus. Lang, a friend of Maenche and Karimi's for the past two years, said he did not see any changes happening on campus in the future because of their loss.

"Unfortunately, it's just going to be a continuation of the Heinrich administration," Lang said. "It's going to be the same people doing nothing."

Even though they came in last with a total of 93 votes, Maenche and Karimi said they are making plans for the next election.

"Don't worry," Karimi said. "We'll run again next year, because nothing is going to change."

Theater's student following grows

By JAMIE BARRETT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Over the past year, the monthly Midnight Madness theater productions have become a sort of "cult" for students, Chris Piatt, senior in theater, said.

"It was a kind of experiment at first, but then students began coming to it so much it developed a kind of cult-like following," Piatt said.

Midnight Madness is a monthly production put on by the department of speech communication, theater and dance. Students are invited to come and present original plays for spontaneous performance. Just before midnight tonight, the next Midnight Madness performance will begin in The Purple Masque Theatre.

Charlotte Macfarland, professor of speech communication, theater and dance, said she started Midnight Madness after talking with some of her colleagues from different universities who had tried it.

"It has been done at some of the universities on the east coast, and after I heard about, I thought it sounded like a lot of fun for our theater department to do," Macfarland said.

Midnight Madness is open to all students and the show is performed spontaneously from scripts brought by the audience members.

Macfarland said Midnight Madness began in the fall 1998 semester and originally was scheduled to be presented just once a year.

"The first one that we had was such a hit that it developed into a near-monthly thing instead of a yearly thing," Macfarland said.

Piatt and Aubrey Kershner, senior in theater and public relations, are the student coordinators and masters of ceremonies for the presentations.

Kershner said the best thing about Midnight Madness is that it is open to all students and anyone who wishes to can participate.

"The students all really enjoy it because it is not presented to them; they create it," Kershner said.

Piatt said there are different themes for each Midnight Madness production and the only thing they ask is that the plays submitted are about that theme.

"The theme for Thursday is the Oscars, so we are asking for all the scripts to have something about the Academy Awards in them," Piatt said.

Macfarland said even though she supervises the productions, she leaves all the decisions up to the students.

"The students involved do all the work and think of the themes," Macfarland said. "We don't even really have to do that much but think of the themes because we don't censor or judge in any way."

Macfarland said the Midnight Madness presentations have become a favorite among theater students and many others on campus.

"We love doing it and people obviously love coming to it because we always pack the house," Macfarland said.

Piatt said there is no real way to tell how the presentation will go tonight because of the spontaneous nature, but he believes it will be as successful as all previous events.

"I have been paranoid before that one would be boring or too explicit or something like that," Piatt said. "But I have not been disappointed by a Midnight Madness yet."

"We love doing it and people obviously love coming to it because we always pack the house."

Fire causes highway accident

By RON WORD
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WELLBORN, Fla. — Twenty-two cars and trucks slammed into each other Wednesday in a pileup along a highway shrouded by blinding smoke from a forest fire. Three people were killed and 21 injured, authorities said.

"I don't understand how I lived through that," said Erik Gebauer, whose Mustang slid under a tractor-trailer. "All I can remember was pushing that freaking door. I felt death right behind me. I can't believe I made it."

The initial pileup involved 16 vehicles in the westbound lanes of Interstate 10 about 90 miles east of Tallahassee in northern Florida, officials said. Some of those vehicles crossed the median, causing a six-car pileup in the eastbound lanes.

The dead were the driver of a pickup truck that caught fire; the driver of a tractor-trailer; and a motorist who stopped to help and was crushed when a load of plywood fell off a truck.

Because of the twisted wreckage, it took several hours for authorities to determine how many vehicles were involved. At least five jackknifed tractor-trailers could be seen in the wreckage.

"The low visibility was a result of the forest fire," said Highway Patrol Lt. Ken Knowles.

Mike Trout, owner of Joe's, said they are having the cook-off to create a fun, festive atmosphere, as well as to collect canned food for the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

Trout said the event is being sponsored by Budweiser, and prizes will be given out to the winners of three different categories — best overall chili, spiciest chili and most unique chili. The judging will start at 11:30 a.m.

The prize for best overall chili is two tickets to a Kansas City Royals game with hospitality and a trophy.

Joe's Tap Room is having a chili cook-off on Saturday. Free chili will be served from noon to 5 p.m., with a donation of a canned food item for the Flint Hills Breadbasket. For more information, call 776-3593.

"Hospitality means the winner will have access to a party tent with free food and drinks and VIP treatment," Trout said.

Winners of the spiciest chili and most unique chili categories also will receive trophies.

Although it's too late for any more contestants to enter,

Trout said he encourages anyone to come in with a canned good and eat the free house chili, as well as sample the different types of chili made by the contestants.

"It's going to be a big party with lots of chili," he said. "We're going to have tons of specials, and prizes will not only be given out to contestants, but also to people who just come in."

Trout said he wants to make the chili cook-off an annual event.

"Aggieville used to have a chili cook-off every year, but there hasn't been one for the past five years," he said. "We want to try and start it back up again on an annual basis."

Trout said he thinks chili cook-offs are fun because people always have their own special recipe and it gives them a chance to show off their original chili.

Shirley Bramhall, executive director of the Flint Hills Breadbasket, said she thought a chili cook-off is an appropriate way to collect donations because it's food related.

"When they first called, we were so surprised," she said. "We are extremely grateful that they thought of us. Welfare reform has been very unpleasant around here lately."

B.J. Walter, Budweiser employee and a judge for the contest, said he is looking forward to trying all the different types of chili.

"I like it hot and spicy," he said.

Aaron Cain, manager of Joe's, said he thinks the cook-off will be a really great time. He also is looking forward to the variety of chili.

"I'd like to see someone enter a vegetarian chili," he said.

Cain said he hopes to see a large number of general public cooks. He also would like to see some of the fraternities' cooks, and housemothers from sororities enter their chili. He encourages everyone to attend.

Food Network provides recipes, entertainment

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Live squid was the weirdest ingredient the chef had to use.

He had to kill it, cut it and then make five dishes with it in less than an hour.

This is what got Mathew Riggs, senior in physical science, interested in the Food Network.

"I got a satellite and had way too many channels," he said. "I saw this crazy show and have been watching it for about a year."

This show is Kaga Takeshi's "Iron Chef," which Riggs describes as a mix between a sporting event and a game show. Four chefs are placed on raised platforms, and two are chosen to compete against the "iron chef" that the host previously has chosen.

The chefs are given one hour to cook between four and five dishes with one ingredient.

"You either really like it or you think it's completely stupid," Riggs said. "The rest of the shows are kind of lame."

Riggs said he gets good ideas from the shows that he sometimes tapes.

"It's a really good way to learn," he said. "But it's next to impossible to cook some of the dishes on there. I really don't have the equipment to make asparagus ice cream."

Another reason Riggs said he watches the program is because he enjoys being a hobby chef and would like to open a restaurant when he retires.

However, this is far from the reason why Michelle Galle, graduate student in early childhood special education, watches the Food Network.

She's been watching two shows, "Emeril Live" and "The Two Fat Ladies," for a year.

"He makes what you would eat on your honeymoon. It's very extravagant."

— Michelle Galle, graduate student in early childhood special education

"The two fat ladies, they're just cool. They make weird things and add onions to everything," Galle said. "I watch Emeril for entertainment."

During the week, Galle said she watches the shows once or twice, but on weekends, she watches "Emeril Live" three or four times.

But she said she doesn't consider herself obsessed with the shows.

"I'm not like a die-hard fan and set my alarm clock to them," she said.

"I'm not disappointed when I miss their show."

Galle said she doesn't try to cook things she learned on the Food Network channel.

Emeril spends a lot of money on stuff, and he doesn't make what the general population eats, she said.

"He makes what you would eat on your honeymoon," Galle said. "It's very extravagant."

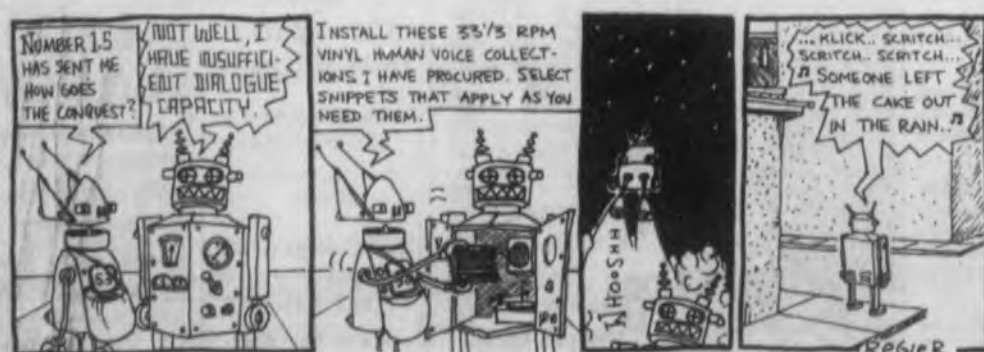

Despite the interest of these two students and others, Cox Communications does not insert local advertising on the Food Network, which came on in August of this year.

Deanna Hall, advertising account executive for Cox Communications, said there is a possibility that local advertising could be included in the future.

"So far, I haven't had any requests from advertisers to be on it," she said. "One of the reasons we don't advertise on it is because it's so new. A lot of people haven't found it and gotten used to it."

Bradley quitting, McCain apparently next as Bush, Gore move on

By DAVID ESPO
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Bill Bradley readied an endorsement of old foe Al Gore on Wednesday as he scripted his exit from the Democratic presidential campaign. John McCain went home to Arizona, his Republican challenge near an end, voluntarily or not.

Gore and Texas Gov. George Bush, nominees-in-waiting, reached out to their defeated rivals and jabbed at one another as they pivoted toward the general election.

Bush labeled the vice president an agent of Washington, and Gore returned the insult, saying Bush was too cozy with the extreme right, as personified by the National Rifle Association and religious broadcaster Pat Robertson.

Bush also appealed to McCain's desire, often stated on the campaign, to deny Gore the White House. "I would say, 'John, let's team up and let's win. Let's beat Al Gore,'" the governor said. He hastened to add he wasn't extending an offer of the vice presidential spot on his ticket.

Gore offered warm words for Bradley, whom he had attacked repeatedly in debates and advertising when the nomination was at risk. "Throughout the campaign I've affirmed my belief that he is a good person," Gore said on NBC. "I have worked with him in the Senate."

Neither Bradley nor McCain scheduled any public appearances during the day. For both, it was a sobering Wednesday after a Super Tuesday that effectively ended their hopes of winning the White House in 2000.

Advisers to Bradley, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the former New Jersey senator would announce his withdrawal today and throw his support to the vice president.

Bradley, 56, plans to stay active in public life and is not expected to rule out another presidential run, the advisers said. They also said he has no interest in the vice presidential spot on the Democratic ticket.

Not that Gore was thinking along those lines. One senior adviser to the vice president, speaking on condition of anonymity, noted that Bradley had not won any contests in his quest for the nomination and Gore would want someone on the ticket who had demonstrated an ability to carry a state.

A senior aide to McCain, also speaking on condition of anonymity, said a list of all possible options had been prepared for his meetings during the day. These included staying in the race to further his political reform agenda, getting out and supporting the GOP ticket and leaving to mount a third-party bid. McCain has said previously he would not leave the GOP, and the adviser said he had no reason to believe the senator had changed his mind.

Republican aides said there had been discussions about how to ease McCain's return to the Senate after a campaign in which he often attacked his own party as beholden to special interests.

The presidential campaign was at a pivot point, but there still were primaries to come, and both Bush and Gore continued to seek votes.

Gore had Michigan and Minnesota on his itinerary for the day, two states where Democratic delegates will be selected over the next few days. At the same time, given the collapse of Bradley's candidacy, the vice president's aides decided to pull back $500,000 in television advertising that had been slated for Southern states with primaries next Tuesday.

Bush set stops today in Colorado, Utah and Wyoming, where delegates will be picked in primaries and caucuses on Friday.

After the virtual nationwide primary on Tuesday, the AP delegate count showed Gore with 1,424 delegates, to 412 for Bradley, out of 2,170 needed for the nomination.

Among Republicans, it was 617 for Bush to 231 for McCain, with 1,034 needed to nominate. Those numbers told the hopelessness of McCain's position. An additional 91 delegates are stake in Western states on Saturday, and 351 more on Tuesday in states across the South, the part of the country where Bush is strongest.

Both Bradley and McCain ran as insurgents against the establishment favorites — entrenched power, as Bradley liked to say.

The former New Jersey senator's campaign took flight briefly last year and early in 2000. But, hampered by his own strategic efforts and McCain's stronger appeal among independents, he lost the lead-off caucuses in Iowa, then the first primary in New Hampshire. He was then cornered in New England and was shut out Super Tuesday.

While he defeated Bush in Vermont, Rhode Island, Massachusetts and Connecticut, McCain lost in the big states of New York, California, Ohio, Georgia and Missouri, and watched while his rival piled up the delegates.

Students present elections broadcast

■ Class makes history with live election data.

By NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Anxiety filled Dole Hall's Studio A as people awaited the Student Governing Association election results. The results arrived in a sealed envelope and, for the first time in K-State's history, were announced live on television over cable Channel 8.

"It was a great first experience," said Jim Mock, manager of production services at the Kansas Regents Educational Center. "It will be great to see what kind of feedback we get on this."

The results of the election were posted 20 minutes after voting ended but were posted only on a private link set up by votehere.net for the Student Senate Elections Committee.

Travis Morgan, elections chair, said tabulating the results was the most difficult part of the on-air broadcast.

"The hardest thing was the tabulation," Morgan said. "We had the results in 20 minutes, but tabulating the results to go on air was a very hectic process."

The polls closed at 6 p.m., and results were tabulated as soon as they were posted.

Students in Advanced Electronic News Reporting received the opportunity to use the skills they learn in class by either reporting the news or working in production for the election-announcement show.

"It's a great way to get the news out to everyone at the same time," Mock said.

He said television and the newly added cable channels created a lot of new opportunities, including broadcasting SGA election results.

Morgan said broadcasting the results over television was beneficial for several reasons.

"Number one, all of the candidates get the results at the same time, and number two, all the students have the opportunity to hear from the candidates," he said. "It's all right here at their fingertips."

Student Body President Jason Heinrich said the process benefited not only the candidates but also those who supported them.

"The people who are supporting you don't have to wait for the results," he said. "It's definitely an improvement."

He said he thought the process went smoothly for a first-time production.

"It's the first time we're doing it, so we all have to be patient," he said. "Once we've done it a couple of times, we'll all be pros."

Mock said the combination of the online voting and the live broadcasting for this year's elections was successful.

"We had two new things this year," Mock said. "We put them together quite well, I believe."

Morgan said he is glad the general election is over, and he is ready to proceed with the less-stressful runoff.

"It's been a wonderful night, but just a little hectic," Morgan said.

Worcester and Pracht's platform includes improving advising, improving technology and creating a Student Activity Center.

After a "Jake and Dana" chant from some of the supporters, Worcester said he appreciated all of the support and encouraged everyone to come out Monday and vote.

"Jesse is going to be tough competition for us," he said. "It's a whole new ball game. Now, every vote counts."

Houses withdraw from Homecoming bidding

By GINA KOHAKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Alpha Chi Omega sorority and Theta Chi fraternity have decided to withdraw from Homecoming bidding.

Upset with the current process of pairing partners, they still plan to participate in Homecoming, but without designated partners like all the other houses, Megan Evans, Alpha Chi president, and Brian Lilley, Theta Chi president, said.

"We feel the system of pairing is ineffective because it breaks down the greek community," Evans said. "We think there should be a random process of bidding or rotation so everyone gets to be with everyone else and nobody gets left out."

The problem amounts to the pairing between Alpha Chi and the fraternities of Theta Chi, Triangle and Phi Kappa Theta, Lilley said.

"It is ineffective because nobody intended on the three smallest fraternities to be a pair, but it was the result and there has been little concern addressed to the issue," Lilley said.

The current process requires the fraternities to join together so they equal in number to a sorority, because sororities are usually larger.

"It creates a problem considering Theta Chi has 35 members and Triangle and Phi Kappa both only have 13 or so," Lilley said. "This adds up to half of any single sorority.

It is 60 of us versus well over a 100 of them."

Eliminating the bidding process was an issue taken under consideration in February by the council of greek representatives, but the motion was voted down.

Instead, it was decided that a fraternity cannot pair with the same fraternity for two years in a row. The pair of fraternities also cannot pair with the same sorority that either have participated with in the past four years.

"The thing we want to stress is that this is an issue that we are addressing because we think it is important — not just because it happened to us first," Lilley said. "It is an issue that was going to come up at some point."

Lilley said Theta Chi members hope their actions will draw attention to the system of Homecoming bidding.

"We are aware that our withdrawal from the bidding process will cause added problems," Lilley said. "We feel that small problems now are beneficial for change, and changing of the Homecoming system is ultimately the goal of all groups who have entered the issue right now."

Mary Schwartz, Panhellenic Council Homecoming chairwoman, said it is hard to know what kind of effect the two houses withdrawing will have.

"We already met to reevaluate for this year. Every year we plan to reevaluate, since we are always learning something new," Schwartz said. "We are constantly trying to improve every aspect like increasing participation or increasing unity or increasing spirit."

The two houses still are weighing their options for future plans.

"Ultimately, Theta Chi wants Homecoming to be refocused on allegiance to KSU, not just allegiance to particular living arrangements," Lilley said.

Alpha Chi is in agreement for changing the focus of Homecoming to include more than greek organizations.

"We have no specific plans since we made the decision last night. We have to do more formulating," Evans said. "We do think though that it would be positive to have all K-State students, the Manhattan community and alumni involved more."

ROLE MODELS

UFM mentoring program helps teen-agers find role models

By JENNIFER HOTCHKISS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

They don't care. They never listen. They aren't responsible. They're always looking for trouble. Sound familiar? Teen-agers increasingly are being labeled like this because the mistakes of a few are speaking louder than the actions of many, said someone trying to change this perception.

"These accusations are unfair," said Shannon Perz, senior in elementary and middle school education. "Teens aren't looking for trouble, they're looking for role models. They really do care about their futures."

In order to better prepare the leaders of tomorrow, Perz has devoted herself to helping at-risk teen-agers in the UFM's mentoring program.

"Teen-agers are the future," she said. "The at-risk teen-agers will be just as influential as others. If we can't get their attention now, we'll have problems in the future."

The UFM mentoring program, co-coordinated by Perz and Brent Yeager, targets teen-agers who are considered at-risk by society because they suffer anything from a simple learning disability to a criminal record with multiple offenses.

The program provides opportunities for teen-agers to interact with K-State students on a weekly basis and discuss beliefs with them in hopes of steering them in a better path.

The mentors meet with the students Wednesday afternoons at the UFM, where they participate in various activities designed to improve the students' the complicated issues in their lives.

Yeager, senior in elementary education, said he became a mentor because he wanted to get in touch with the issues adolescents face today. He also wanted to share his values and self-esteem while offering new ways to handle peer pressure.

At last Wednesday's session, students were given a problem and asked to prepare a short skit addressing a possible solution. The problems included rape, teen suicide, drugs, drinking and driving, dropping out of school and teenage pregnancy.

"Our main goal is to bring awareness of the issues they will face, or ways to handle the issues they are currently facing," Yeager said. "We want to show them how to prevent bad situations from happening by taking a long look at their values and beliefs."

Web site problems temporary

■ DARS ready for student use, still undergoing renovations.

By JENN DAVOREN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Representatives of the Registrar's Office still are working the kinks out of the Degree Audit Report System.

DARS, which can be accessed through KATS, became available for use by K-State students on Monday.

The Web site is meant to facilitate advising services on campus, aiding K-State students as they check their progress toward graduation.

However, students in certain majors might find that DARS cannot run a report for their particular academic program.

The main problem with keeping the report system up and running is the constant changing of academic requirements, said Susan Woodard, assistant to the registrar and coordinator of DARS.

"It's working for a majority of students, but a certain amount of degree programs haven't been approved," she said.

Woodard said representatives from the registrar's office, the Office of Admissions, information systems and representatives from each of K-State's colleges were following a hectic work schedule to keep DARS working for students.

As soon as a certain curriculum is operating through the system, though, changes in graduation requirements can cause problems with the program, said Karen Pence, assistant dean of human ecology.

"It's a constant thing," she said. "Some Ballots are smaller now that only one decision remains for K-State student voters to make.

The runoff election for the student body president and vice president will be from 8 a.m. to 6 p.m. Monday.

The two tickets in the runoff are Jesse McCurry, senior in agricultural journalism and political science, and Kylo Heller, junior in agronomy; and Jake Worcester, senior in agricultural economics, and Dana Pracht, junior in life sciences and psychology.

Students can vote in the same locations as in the previous election, and online ballots still will be available, said Travis Morgan, Student Senate elections chair.

"It's the same scenario, except there are no write-ins," Morgan said. "The method of voting should be a lot easier, with no census form to fill out and only one box to check."

House members reject bill to revive primary in Kansas

TOPEKA — The House has rejected a last-ditch effort to revive a presidential primary in Kansas.

House members on Thursday rejected, 50-74, an attempt by Rep. Richard Alldritt, D-Harper, to bring a bill on the primary up for debate.

Alldritt called on colleagues Wednesday to take up a bill that actually would have repealed the primary. He had planned to offer an amendment requiring the state to have a primary by May 1.

On Thursday, Alldritt maintained his support for the election even after Arizona Sen. John McCain suspended his campaign for the Republican presidential nomination and former New Jersey Sen. Bill Bradley pulled out of the Democratic race.

"Democracy is meaningless when people do not have the right to vote," Alldritt said.

Alldritt said this was his final attempt to resuscitate this year's primary.

Last month, Gov. Bill Graves signed into law a measure canceling the state's primary, which had been scheduled for April 4.

The new would direct Secretary of State Ron Thornburgh to get Kansas involved with at least five other states in a series of primaries or caucuses on the same day in future elections.

Many legislators said the state couldn't afford to spend the $1.5 million to reimburse its 105 counties for costs associated with the election.

Cessna collision in Florida takes lives of 4 passengers

BRADENTON, Fla. — Two small planes collided on a runway in a huge fireball Thursday, killing all four people on board.

The cause of the accident is under investigation.

The single-engine planes, a Cessna 152 and a Cessna 172, carried two people each. No one on the ground was hurt.

"There was a big fire, so everyone went out there," said Rosalie Radtke, a secretary at a company a quarter-mile from Sarasota Bradenton International Airport. "All the guys saw was a big ball of fire."

An air traffic controller had cleared one of the planes for takeoff, said Pat Cariseo, a spokesman for the National Transportation Safety Board in Washington, D.C.. At the same time, the pilot of the other plane was granted permission to position his aircraft and hold on the same runway.

What happened next was not immediately clear, Cariseo said.

Sheriff's spokesman Dave Bristow said there was a "tremendous impact followed by tremendous fire." One plane was heavily damaged; there was almost nothing left of the other aircraft, he said.

Investigators were interviewing six witnesses, some of whom gave conflicting statements, Bristow said. NTSB investigators were sent from Miami and Washington.

The victims' names were not immediately released.

The airport, about 50 miles south of Tampa, handles small private planes, domestic jets and international charter flights from Canada. The airport handles 1.5 million passengers a year. Miami International Airport, by comparison, has about 34 million passengers a year.

It was the second accident at the airport in 24 hours. A single-engine aircraft had trouble with its landing gear and made a belly landing Wednesday.

There were no injuries.

Some NBC affiliates refuse to air new cartoon comedy

BOISE, Idaho — At least seven NBC stations have decided not to air the network's new comedy "God, the Devil and Bob" because of the subject matter.

The show, which was scheduled to premiere Thursday and then settle into a Tuesday night time slot, is a cartoon about an everyman named Bob and the moral questions he faces.

TV stations in Boise, Pocatello and Twin Falls, Idaho; Salt Lake City; Tupelo, Miss.; Shreveport, La.; and South Bend, Ind., have refused to air the program. NBC has 215 affiliates nationally.

Originally, some of those stations decided to air the program in late-night hours, but NBC said the program must be aired in its regular time slot or not at all.

TAKE note

Influenza levels. As bad as the outbreak looked a couple of months ago, this winter's flu season was no more ferocious than any of the past five years, the government said Thursday.

The flu season peaked during the week ending Dec. 25, with many hospitals deluged with patients and some health professionals saying it was the worst outbreak they had seen in a long time.

With the flu season nearing an end, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention reported that 12,651 people — about normal for the past five years — have tested positive for the flu since Oct. 3.

The actual number of people with the flu was in the tens of millions, but the CDC does not keep an overall total, and instead tracks only cases confirmed by tests.

Of those, 99 percent had the type A Sydney strain, which has been the most common the last three seasons.

About 20,000 Americans die of flu complications every year.

The CDC said the death toll was probably about the same this year, though the agency still is studying that.

In two of the past five years, 1995-96 and 1996-97, the season peaked in mid-December and January.

Peaks in the other seasons occurred in February and early March.

Many people suffering from flu-like symptoms have been infected with some nasty germ, but probably not one of the four types of influenza, said Dr. Andrea Winquist with the CDC's National Center for Infectious Diseases.

Many common viruses and bacteria cause similar symptoms.

"People tend to use the word 'flu' for a lot of things," she said.

Alan Arvello, a physician's assistant in Amarillo, Texas, said the clinic where he works was filled from November to January with people complaining of the flu.

He said many learned something else was causing their misery.

"A lot of times, once we counsel people, they say, 'Oh, OK, I didn't have the flu,'" Arvello said.

Bronchitis and pneumonia are two ailments that often resemble the flu and require hospitalization for many people.

The CDC estimates 10 to 20 percent of the population gets the flu every season.

MICHAEL YOUNG/COLLEGIAN

Dr. Jane Henney addresses an audience of K-State students, faculty, staff, community members and colleagues Thursday night about the purpose of the Food and Drug Administration. "It is our responsibility at Food and Drug Administration to assure the safety of the products it regulates," Henney said.

Commissioner applauds FDA

■ Speaker says public trust important for FDA.

By COURTNEY DUFFIELD
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The United States now leads the world in the process of approving drugs without compromising safety, the commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration said.

Dr. Jane Henney returned to Kansas to address an audience of K-State students, faculty, staff, community members and colleagues Thursday night about the purpose of the FDA.

She attended the University of Kansas and in November 1998 became the commissioner of the FDA.

"I am very appreciative to return to the place where I have many friends and colleagues," Henney said.

The lecture was sponsored by the Mark Enloe Memorial Lectureship, the K-State Division of Biology, the George S. Bascon Workshop Series and the K-State Cancer Center.

The FDA looks at numerous products used by the public, and not all of these products are medications, Henney said.

"It is our responsibility at Food and Drug Administration to assure the safety of the products it regulates," Henney said.

Henney said it takes about 12 months for a product to be approved by the FDA. She also said products used for terminal illness are usually approved in around six months.

One of the responsibilities of the FDA is to keep the trust of the public, Henney said. She compared the FDA to its counterpart in Europe, which she said has lost the public's trust.

"We need to do all we can to ensure to keep it for the future," Henney said.

It is not possible to know all of the side effects of a product, Henney said. When a product is tested in clinical tests, it is only tested for one specific factor, other factors are held constant.

Henney said no product approved by the FDA is completely safe. She said the FDA has to weigh the risks and benefits of each product it approves.

"I want to ensure you that these uncertainties do not keep us from making decisions," Henney said.

Henney also addressed the availability of drugs. Although there are both benefits and risks to purchasing drugs over the Internet, she said people who cannot make it to the pharmacy or who live in rural areas still can have access to medications through the Web.

She said the risks of purchasing drugs over the Internet involve the fact that the doctor does not know the patient's history, there is no diagnosis and there could be a misdiagnosis.

Jan Coles, instructor of biology, said Henney would be speaking at a biology seminar today at 9:30 a.m. in Ackert 120.

The seminar is open to the public.

Coles said she wished Thursday's lecture would have involved more biological aspects.

"I thought that it was really aimed at telling us what the FDA does, it was basically a PR talk," Coles said.

McCain, Bradley end campaigns for respective party nominations

By RON FOURNIER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Falling as swiftly as they soared, John McCain and Bill Bradley abandoned their presidential races Thursday and chided their triumphant rivals on the way out.

"Millions of Americans have rallied to our banner," McCain said as both candidates sought to leverage the support they had earned.

The Arizona senator pledged to press his case for political reform and said Republicans will slip into the mists of history without it. McCain, who pulled swarms of Democrats and independents into GOP contests, offered nominee-in-waiting George W. Bush his best wishes — but not his endorsement.

An hour before McCain bowed out, Bradley told reporters he would support Vice President Al Gore, but he also accused his fellow Democrat of distortions in their primary fight. "I hope that he will run a better campaign in the general election," said the former New Jersey senator, who was unable to win any primary or caucus.

Still, it was a triumphant day for the political establishment that backed Bush and Gore, both of whom vanquished their rivals after stiff challenges. "When you do battle with entrenched power ... it's very difficult," Bradley said.

Within minutes of McCain's announcement, Bush's team was reaching out to McCain intermediaries in an effort to mend fences. The rivals themselves spoke briefly by telephone but settled nothing.

"John needs some time to think, and I need some time," Bush said.

Said to be still seething at the Texas governor, McCain is in no hurry to make peace. He planned to take a week's vacation before determining what leverage he has with Bush and what he might want to achieve with it, said a McCain adviser.

McCain knows he is not bargaining from a strong position, but the adviser said his boss wants to somehow keep his signature issue — campaign finance reform — on the political agenda.

With that goal in mind, McCain quit the race but didn't shut down his campaign — a technicality that keeps his options open in case he wants to make things uncomfortable for Bush, who needs McCain's endorsement to unify the party.

McCain's options, according to the adviser, include barnstorming the country to promote campaign finance reform, leading a platform fight at the Republican National Convention or even mounting a third-party presidential bid. Aides said that last option is remote.

McCain himself has ruled out bolting the GOP and said Thursday, "I love my home." He did, however, leave himself a loophole by saying in his departure speech that the party deserves the allegiance of none if it doesn't embrace campaign finance reform.

One of McCain's top supporters said he urged the senator to let go of the enmity he feels toward Bush. "There's no question that there's some bitterness there and some anger," Sen. Charles Hagel, R-Neb., said.

Committee wants Nebraska as new rival

By JENNIFER GIER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate's Allocations Committee wants K-State to declare a new rivalry.

In a resolution read in Thursday night's Senate meeting, the committee proposed K-State cease its rivalry with the University of Kansas and begin one with the University of Nebraska-Lincoln.

According to the resolution, "a Jayhawk is a silly, ugly, fictitious, weak, little animal that doesn't exist in nature. The University of Kansas has lost every football game in our rivalry since it mattered, and in basketball, let's just not talk about that."

For these reasons the resolution proposes that K-State's SGA stop recognizing KU as a primary rival. Carlton Getz, Senate allocations chair, said there is no challenge nor fun in beating the same football team by 60 points every year.

The resolution went to referral and will be addressed further at the next Senate meeting.

In other Senate business, a newly formed organization called The House That K-State Built wants students to put on their dancing shoes.

The House That K-State Built is an organization working with K-State's Habitat for Humanity chapter to build a home. The organization was co-created by Mary Bosco, Senate vice chair, and Matt Wildman. The organization has about 25 members.

Bosco said the idea is to have all campus organizations come together in a giant community-service project.

The House That K-State Built will sponsor a danceathon from 5 p.m. April 14 to 5 a.m. April 15. Bosco said all students are eligible to dance in the all-night event after raising $100. Building the house will cost $45,000, and the organization is in need of dancers.

The organizations will meet at 6:30 p.m. Sunday in the Union Courtyard with everyone who wants to participate in the danceathon. The organization will help participants raise their $100 by going door to door and asking Manhattan residents to donate money to the fundraiser.

The entertainment at the fundraiser will be a juggler, a dance instructor to teach ballroom dancing and swing dancing, a disc jockey and two yet-unnamed bands.

"All students are welcome to participate," Bosco said.

Participants can pick up a danceathon packet in the Office of Student Activities and Services or e-mail the organization at ksu-house@ksu.edu.

Asbury should resign as Cats' head coach

It's time for Tom Asbury to step down.

K-State is in need of significant changes within the basketball program, and the housekeeping must start with its head coach.

Asbury, who has been at K-State for six seasons, has had his chances to win here.

He has not done so.

To put it bluntly, Asbury simply has to go.

The Wildcats' season-ending loss to the University of Kansas on Thursday is just another thorn in the side of one of the worst basketball seasons in K-State history. K-State, 9-19 overall and 2-15 in the Big 12, posted its worst record in 54 years, and third losing season under Asbury.

Despite posting the conference's best defense the past four seasons, Asbury has been unable to win conference games — most of all, conference road games.

With Asbury as coach, K-State is 29-64 in conference games and 5-36 on the road.

That just doesn't cut it in one of the nation's toughest basketball conferences.

With that in mind, K-State's Department of Intercollegiate Athletics needs to step back and look at what it will take to bring the Wildcats back to conference competition, starting with a new coach.

Sure, missed shots, bad passes and turnovers in a game are not always the coach's fault, but when the same players continue to make mistakes week in and week out, year in and year out, coaching has to be questioned. Most importantly, Asbury's coaching needs to be questioned. K-State needs to act swiftly and begin pursuing new personnel as soon as possible.

Make the decision regarding Asbury's future soon, and take whatever actions necessary to put this dark cloud over Wildcat basketball behind us.

Most importantly, do it before it looms as a cloud over next season as well.

Reader grateful to Pitts for keeping Union open

Editor,

Work on the K-State Student Union is drawing to a close, and I would like to take this opportunity to express my thanks and appreciation to Bernard Pitts and his colleagues for keeping the Union open and functioning while surrounded by what often appeared to the outsider to be chaos.

It meant long hours and a lot of stress for all concerned. Even more impressive was the fact that those working in the Union — from Pitts on down — did this with a smile and a readiness to help their customers.

We all owe you guys one.

The Collegian's Reader Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on any topic for 20 seconds.

Does anyone else think Ken Wells was dropped on his head repeatedly as a child?

I wish people would quit complaining about gas prices and either walk or ride a bicycle.

Christian-bashing. Over-emphasis of trivialities. Expression of conservative views. The Campus Fourum seems, to me, to be a communist propaganda machine.

It's not fair that all the people who call the Fourum get to force me to read what they have to say.

I would just like to say that, after watching the coverage on television of the voting here at K-State, it is clear the school of journalism is turning out some fine products.

Hey, Shawn Vick, why don't you try looking at the camera, bud.

I was just curious if those news anchors for the coverage of the elections were required to take public speaking and get a grade higher than a C.

I was just wondering if the three people doing the election coverage could be any worse at their jobs.

I'd like to thank the school of journalism for the fine election coverage. Next year, maybe you can get someone who can talk.

If the reporters on Channel 8's SGA coverage plan on pursuing a career in newscasting, they should think again.

Note to all greeks: when painting another house's car windows, aim for the ones in the lot, not the ones parked on the public roads.

Justin Hayworth's photo on the front of Wednesday's Collegian is beautiful.

I wish the Collegian Voter's Guide came in an edited version.

Yeah, right, editorial board. Heinrich didn't have a clue to go after smoking until people started calling the Fourum and complaining about it.

Calling the Fourum might not be as effective as voting, but when I vote, I can't check a box that says, "Ken Wells, you're awesome."

Nice try, Hayworth. But you still need to take a few lessons from Kelly Glasscock — the master.

ADAM HAYES/Collegian

The man's MAN

Male portion of population overlooked due to society's chauvinistic influences workplace and society, and with the societal idea that all women should look like Shania Twain or Denise Richards.

Amid the storm of Girl Power and Woman's Lib, a large and influential group is being neglected and ignored by the rest of society, including themselves. They are relying on centuries of culturally ingrained stoicism to survive in a society where they are being deemed less and less important. This group is spread across the globe and is a member of every ethnicity, culture, nation, race and religion found on earth. Nearly every other person in the world is a member of this group, yet their problems are going largely unnoticed. It is hard not to realize that this group is the male portion of our population.

While women zealously are fighting for equal rights, men everywhere are being forced to remain within the confines of their plaid boxers. Due to their confines, men have begun to struggle with a variety of problems that — if left unchecked — are potentially destructive, not only to men the world over but also to society.

Women have experienced many of these same problems already and still do, however, but not necessarily to the same degree. College women are not the only ones to suffer from the problems of eating disorders and body perception.

At least one out of every 10 people with an eating disorder is male. Let's face it, thin is in. And just like the tech vests, it is becoming a problem that is influencing the college-age generation.

Just like women, men suffer from depression. In fact, one man in 10 can expect to develop a depressive or manic-depressive episode at least once in their lives. This could be why almost three times as many men (9.8 million) as women (3.9 million) are problem drinkers, and why more men (67 percent) than women (54 percent) between the ages of 18 and 25 drink. Not to mention that men continue to have a higher rate of current illicit drug use than women (8.5 percent vs. 4.5 percent).

As if things weren't bad enough, things do get worse.

Aside from most high school dropouts being male, the lifetime chances of a person going to prison are higher for men (9 percent) than for women (1.1 percent). Men are 3.2 times more likely to be murdered than women and four times more likely to die by suicide, which would explain why the life expectancy of men is only 73.1 years compared to 79.1 years for women.

These statistics should not be too surprising when one considers that the men in our society are taught at an early age not to say anything when they are lonely or sad or fearful. Above all, they are taught not to cry. Instead they suck it up, hold it in and move on. Our own society gives women permission to show their feelings but denies men the same freedom — except when it comes to anger, and then they end up being punished for such displays. When will it be their turn?

It's time to realize the current lexicon that frames manhood in America needs to change. This means we no longer can use phrases such as: "Real men don't cry," "Mama's boy," "Take it like a man" and "Don't be a sissy."

We no longer can expect our young men to grow up to be the next Dirty Harry, John Wayne, Brad Pitt or Tom Cruise.

We need to accept them for who and what they are, not what we expect them to be.

Beware of relationship pitfalls; couples need to spend quality time together

Relationships aren't always wine and roses.

In fact, they typically have their fair share of thorns and weeds.

There are advantages to being in a relationship, just as there are disadvantages. The same thing can be said about being single.

Listed below are pitfalls that I have experienced, either in my own previous relationships or viewed in others' relationships as best one can from the outside looking in. Granted, there are other mistakes that couples make, but due to space limitations I tried to focus on the most common themes.

■ Couples that spend too much time together, a.k.a. those glued at the hip.

■ Couples that don't spend enough quality time together.

■ Jealousy or lack of trust. The shade of green can ruin something wonderful.

■ Lack of communication. This means you have to listen to what the other person is saying and thinking. In return, you need to tell them your thoughts and feelings.

■ Taking each other for granted.

■ Greediness or selfishness; the refusal to compromise. As Emma Goldman once said, "If love does not know how to give and take without restrictions, it is not love, but a transaction."

■ Misguided philosophy that money can buy love. The diamond necklace might sparkle, but if your eyes don't, then what is the point?

■ Rumors. When you let gossip break you up or cause fights without talking about it first.

■ Trying to change each other instead of accepting each other for who they really are.

■ Trying to control each other. This includes time restrictions and friendships with other people.

■ People don't love themselves; thus, they cannot truly love another.

■ Overdependency in which one thinks they cannot function without the other. This goes back to the glued-at-the-hip syndrome.

If you think you can't breathe without a significant other, it is time to purchase a much needed inhaler. If you think that you cannot live without the other person, check your pulse, because you can.

■ Too many couples give up their outside interests, hobbies, and worse, their friends. When you put everyone else on the back burner, don't expect them to be too sympathetic when you need someone to talk to when you get burned.

■ People sometimes are too forgiving or not forgiving enough. It is one thing to refuse to accept someone who cheated on you, and another to refuse to accept someone who can belch the alphabet.

■ The relationship is purely physical and not mental or emotional. Or vice versa. There has to be a certain level of attraction on all levels to make it work.

■ Lack of knowledge on relationships. Don't expect someone who never has been in a relationship before to know how they work right away.

■ The realization that every relationship is different. What works for one very well could make another falter.

■ Lack of respect for themselves and their significant other.

■ Lack of common goals or commitment levels. If the woman just wants to date the man until she meets her prince charming and the man is willing to get on one knee, or vice versa ... there could be a conflict of interest.

■ The relationship moves too fast without really knowing each other. Sometimes this works, but more often than not it doesn't. There is nothing like being in love with the idea of love.

■ You tell each other more information than the other needs to know. There are certain things that every individual in a relationship deserves to know, but some of the additional details could be eliminated.

■ Cheating. Everyone seems to have different definitions of what cheating means. To me, it is whatever you would not dream of doing with your significant other around or a family member ... depending on which state you are from.

■ Accusations of cheating that are false. There is nothing worse than being accused of cheating when you are completely loyal.

■ Spending too much time focusing on the past, far more time looking towards the unpredictable future and not enough time appreciating what you have today.

■ Reading advice such as this and taking it to heart instead of determining what will make your own relationship work.

Networking causes increase in enrollment

By JOSS BRIGGS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Many departments at K-State are benefiting from networking efforts between academia and industry, but the Department of Marketing and International Business in the College of Business Administration sits near the top.

The marketing and international business department benefits from an extensive integration effort made three years ago.

"We're close to having all students have a position prior to graduation," said David Andrus, head of the marketing and international business department. "Many students who want paid internships over the summer have that opportunity as well."

Enrollment has increased as a result of the networking combined with the current strong market. There were 126 marketing majors in the spring 1996, and about 340 marketing majors this semester.

"We've always had a strong placement, but it has increased lately because of the expanding market and because the department of marketing has developed a lot more contacts with outside businesses," Andrus said.

Many of the business contacts have been developed through an advisory council established in the department three years ago.

"K-State is leading the way for many schools when it comes to advisory councils," Andrus said. "Most colleges have an advisory council at the deans' level, but it's rare to see one at the department level."

The departments of Finance and Accounting have had one for quite some time, and the marketing and international business department decided to follow the lead.

"It's really been an advantage to us. It's helped us place students, give paid summer internships, retain faculty, increase scholarship donations for students and help the college network with industry," Andrus said.

The department works with 34 firms, most of which are Fortune 500 companies.

"They give us input on our curriculum, and we discuss ways which we can improve our teaching and research," Andrus said. "The goal is to have a mechanism where we produce a relevant educational experience."

The companies range from Black & Decker to Aventis.

"We have a very strong working relationship with Kansas State," said Don Davidson, Aventis director of staffing. "We have found some very talented and quality people that we have been able to bring into our sales organization over that time frame."

Davidson said the advisory council helps K-State teach relative matter more effectively.

"Sometimes in academia, they teach upon information in a book. We're able to bring a real world aspect," Davidson said. "It makes for a good match for those candidates we are looking for to come into the workplace."

Another participant in the advisory council is Hormel Foods Corporation.

"We want to make sure K-State students really understand and know the actual working environment at Hormel," Janine Bercu, brand manager, said. "I think the more that kids on campus understand us the more they know about what they want to get out of a job, and hopefully they think about us while their in that process."

Bercu said Hormel's plant in Fremont, Neb., uses many graduates from K-State.

"I think that Hormel has done a really good job with K-State students, and K-Staters have done an excellent job with our company," Bercu said.

State tournament boosts Manhattan-area economy

By JOSS BRIGGS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Entire towns from across Kansas have shut down this week to support their local high school basketball teams in the 2-A State Tournament.

Manhattan is the host of the tournament for the 11th-consecutive year.

"We have approximately 13,000 fans in town during the four-day event, which creates a significant impact," said Becky Blake, director of the Manhattan Convention and Visitors Bureau. "They stay in our hotels, eat in our restaurants and fill their cars at our service stations around town, as well as shop and enjoy entertainment activities."

The effect is not just limited to economic benefits. It also is a recruitment tool for K-State.

"The exposure that the students and the parents are receiving from the tournament helps them better understand what K-State is all about," Lawrence Moeder, K-State director of admissions, said. "If they spend any time at all looking around the university, they'll realize K-State has a lot to offer."

Some high school students might choose K-State because of impressions they receive while attending events such as the 2-A tournament.

"The tournament is very special for K-State," Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said. "Many of the communities are K-State communities, and they virtually turn off their lights when they leave to support their team."

The tournament is a joint effort between the Kansas High School Activities Association, the city of Manhattan and K-State, which provides Bramlage Coliseum.

"We've gotten the reputation of being one of the best sites in the state, according to the teams," Charles Thomas, director of Bramlage Coliseum, said. "Most of these teams are not used to playing in a major college setting, and the experience is unique for them."

Tremendous community support from volunteers and the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce contribute to the tournament's success, Thomas said.

"A lot of preparation, a lot of planning and a lot of coordination are involved," Thomas said. "It's extremely well run."

The state basketball tournament doesn't compare with K-State football or the Country Stampede, but it provides a big bonus to Manhattan businesses every March, Blake said.

"We certainly welcome the business it brings," Blake said. "Our goal is to put on a first class tournament which the teams, officials and fans enjoy and want to have in Manhattan again next year."

Cox Communications ends free premium channel viewing

By NEAL MANGELS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The cable company that serves the Manhattan area recently has changed its name, but little else will change.

Roger Erichsen, district manager for Cox Communications, said the acquisition of Multimedia Cablevision by Cox will not cause many changes.

"There is a different sign on the door, and different logos will be on the trucks," Erichsen said. "We really haven't seen any big changes."

Cox allowed cable subscribers to view the premium channels for more than a month, Erichsen said. He said this was done for two reasons.

Cox wanted to market the premium channels to give viewers the opportunity to see if they would like to subscribe to them. They also were implementing a change in channel locations.

"We just incorporated the marketing and the change," Erichsen said.

Erichsen said the change is complete, and the premium channels should be available only to subscribers now.

"If people are still getting them for free, it is probably a mistake," Erichsen said.

Erichsen said K-State's channel would not be affected by the change.

Fred Damkroger, K-State telecommunications director, said K-State's channel is in the first year of a three-year contract. He said with the contract and the same management team from Multimedia intact, there is little possibility for change.

"I don't foresee any changes," Damkroger said.

Damkroger said K-State can broadcast the channel without the cable system.

"If they wanted to change things, it wouldn't cripple us," Damkroger said. "We have the equipment."

Erichsen said Multimedia was a division of Gannett Corporation and was purchased by Cox when Gannett decided to sell. He said the cable system officially was changed to Cox as of Jan. 31.

This is the second change in two years. In September 1998, they became Multimedia after a business swap was made with TCI Communications. Cox is the fifth-largest cable company in the nation.

Erichsen said Cox will continue to make new features available to its customers.

"We are planning on introducing high-speed Internet access somewhere around the middle of the year," Erichsen said.

Three ways to beat the high cost of college.

1. The Montgomery GI Bill
2. Student loan repayment
3. Part-time income

The Army Reserve Alternate Training Program is a smart way to pay for college.

First, if you qualify, the Montgomery GI Bill can provide you with over $7,000 for current college expenses or approved vo/tech training.

Second, if you have—or obtain—a qualified student loan not in default, you may get it paid off at the rate of 15% per year or $1,500, whichever is greater, up to a maximum of $10,000. Selected military skills can double that maximum.

Third, you can earn part-time money in college, and here's how it works: One summer you take Basic Training, and the next summer you receive skill training at an Army school. You'll earn over $1,600 for Basic and even more for skill training. Then you'll attend monthly meetings at an Army Reserve unit near your college, usually one weekend a month plus two weeks a year. You'll be paid over $107 a weekend to start. It's worth thinking about. Give us a call: 539-7243

OVER AT THE HALF

KU unbeatable due to inconsistent scoring, faulty defense of Cats

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Since the inception of the Phillips 66 Big 12 Tournament, the No. 12 seed has never won, and Thursday was no different as the No. 5 seed Kansas Jayhawks defeated the K-State Wildcats 84-60 at Kemper Arena in the first round.

Kansas point guard Jeff Boschee enjoyed yet another fine shooting day against the Wildcats (9-19, 2-15) as he posted 21 first-half points, making 7-of-8 three-pointers to give Kansas (23-8, 12-5) a 50-23 lead at the half.

On the day, Boschee was 7-of-10 from the field, including a missed layup in the first half.

Boschee scored a career-high 24 points Feb. 12 in the Hawks' 94-65 beating of the Cats at Bramlage Coliseum.

"We just hoped we could give them a better game," K-State head coach Tom Asbury said. "The game was over at halftime to too good a team to catch up to. We just made too many mistakes, not only defensively on Boschee, but turned the ball over too much and they made us pay."

Senior forward Josh Reid, who scored 10 points against No. 24 Kansas, said Boschee is one of the conference's elite players.

"We let him get too comfortable out there," Reid said. "I think he is one of the best in the Big 12, and showed that tonight, obviously."

Despite outscoring the Hawks

37-34 in the second half, the first half proved to be too much for the Cats to overcome. Kansas shot 63 percent from the field and 73 percent from beyond the arc in the opening half.

Asbury attributed the lackluster start to being too anxious to play Kansas, a team that K-State hasn't beaten in 19 straight meetings.

"I think we were too hyped up and we played too hard at times," Asbury said. "With the adrenaline flow such as it was, you can get fatigued too quickly."

"I don't think there is any question that we tried too hard to get to them without any degree of success. I think we have doubt that we can beat these guys."

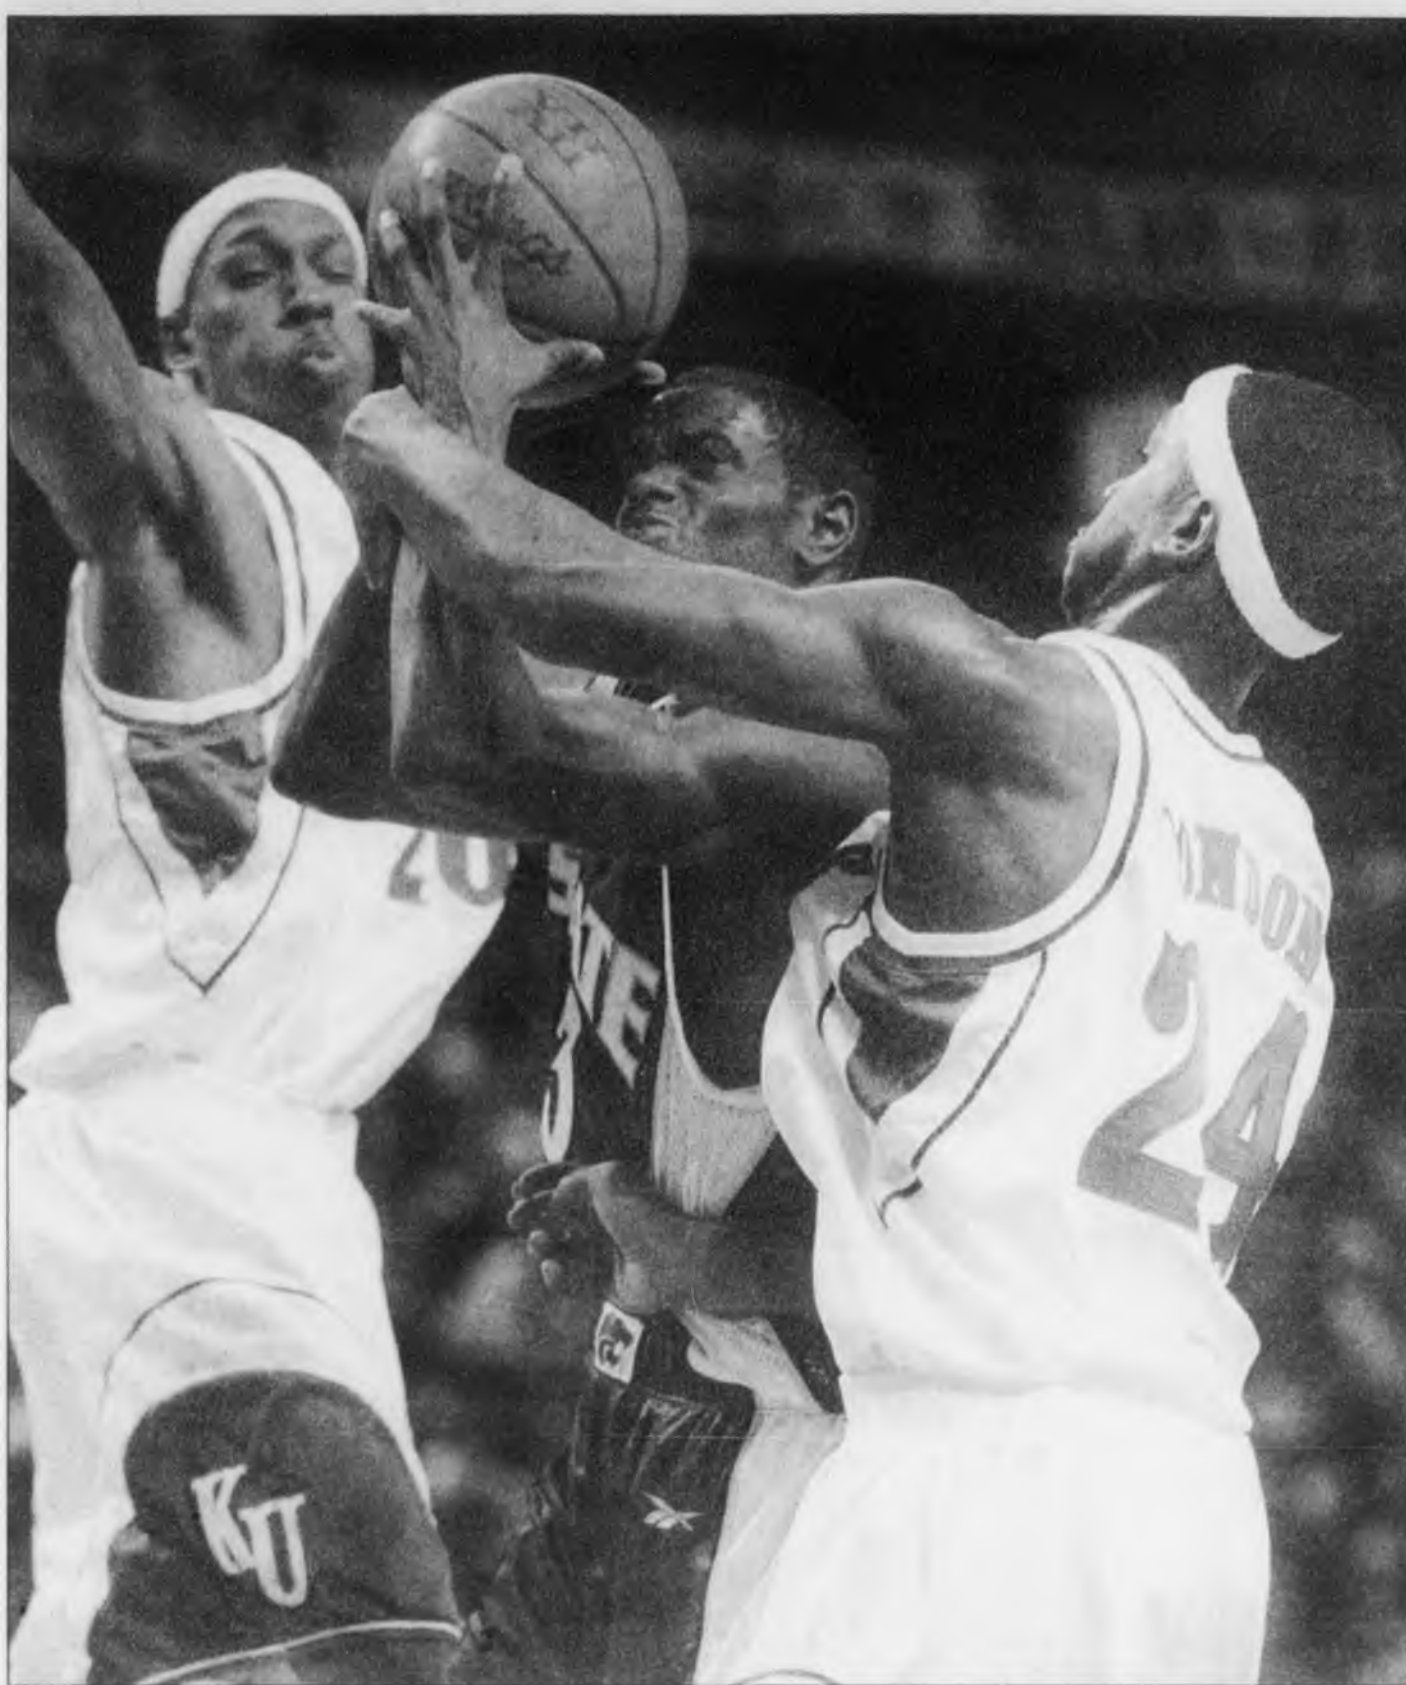

K-State turned the ball over 23 times in the game, something Kansas thrived on, outscoring the Cats 29-7 off turnovers.

Senior guard Cortez Groves led the Cats in scoring with 15 points, while senior forward Tony Kitt added 12, as well 12 rebounds for his ninth double-double of the season.

In the second half, K-State managed to put together scoring runs of seven, 10 and nine.

Asbury, who said Wednesday that he would not resign following the season, did say that coaching played a part in the K-State loss.

"Right now, I wish we would have gotten out and defended the three better," Asbury said. "I wish we hadn't turned it over 23 times. I wish this and that, but that's obviously the coaching."

Williams offers coach support as job status remains in limbo

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — K-State men's basketball coach Tom Asbury still has his job, for now.

Once was enough for Asbury, who said Wednesday that he would not resign from K-State. K-State went 9-19 overall and 2-15 in Big 12 action.

Asbury's stance leaves K-State, if it decides to pursue a new coach, one option—to fire him and pay off the remaining two years left on a contract extension he signed following the 1996 season.

Following K-State's 84-60 drubbing by the Kansas Jayhawks on Thursday in the first round of the Phillips 66 Big 12 Tournament, Asbury chose to say as little as possible regarding his future at K-State.

"I coached the game, and my focus was strictly the game at this point in time," Asbury said. "Down the road, I'll have the opportunity to think about the other things."

"Yesterday, at the press conference, I answered every question that I can or will answer regarding my future. So, I don't see any reason to be redundant in regards to asking questions along those lines about my future and whether or not I'll be here. That will probably wait in time."

Kansas' head coach Roy Williams said he feels for Asbury and what he's gone through this season.

"You definitely have empathy for that," Williams said of Asbury, who has never beaten Kansas. "You feel sorry, you feel compassionate at the same time."

"It's been very difficult for Tom this year," Williams said. "Every coach feels the pain he's been going through."

Williams said money is not the root of every coaching decision.

"People say you guys know what you're getting into, having all that money and all that glamour," Williams said. "That's not true. Roy Williams, Tom Asbury, Eddie Sutton — none of us got into coaching because of money. Tom Asbury started coaching in high school basketball because he wanted to coach."

Women's tennis to meet Texas Tech to kick-off Big 12 Conference play

By DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The women's tennis squad will open Big 12 Conference play Saturday as the Wildcats travel to Lubbock, Texas, for a 10 a.m. showdown with Texas Tech.

K-State (5-4) is the final Big 12 team to begin conference action in 2000.

The Cats are coming off two losses last weekend in Madison, Wis., which dropped the team eight slots to No. 58 in the latest Intercollegiate Tennis Association rankings, released Wednesday.

Meanwhile, the Red Raiders' (2-8, 1-3) last action came in a 1-8 loss to Kansas on Sunday. Texas Tech's lone win in the match came at No. 1 doubles as Amanda Earhart and Ayako Suzuki defeated their Jayhawk opponents, 8-5. Earhart is also Tech's top returnee at No. 1 singles.

K-State head coach Steve Bietau, in his 16th year at the helm of the tennis program, will take several players to Lubbock who are performing well this spring.

Freshman Petra Sedlmajerova is ranked No. 51 in the nation and holds a perfect 9-0 record in singles competition, dropping only two sets in 2000.

Junior Anna Pampoulova has been on a streak of her own. The co-captain has won 11 of her past 13 singles matches since Oct. 16 of last fall, primarily from the No. 3 slot. She's won eight of nine in the spring, including both matches last weekend in Wisconsin.

In addition, junior Eva Novotna and sophomore Kathy Chuda have both won five of their past six singles matches, and the doubles tandem of Sedlmajerova/Novotna has notched six straight victories for the Cats.

Last spring, the Cats finished ahead of the Red Raiders in the conference standings. K-State went 5-18, 3-8, good for ninth in the league, whereas Tech posted a 4-18, 2-9, mark, dropping them to 11th in the Big 12.

However, Texas Tech leads the overall series with K-State, 5-3. Although, the Red Raiders have won just one of the previous three matches in Lubbock, including a 6-3 loss to the Cats a year ago.

Track team expects strong season finish

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It is now or never for members of the K-State track and field team.

This weekend the team will have six team members competing in the NCAA indoor track and field championships at the University of Arkansas.

K-State will send pole vaulter Erin Anderson, whom distance coach Mike Smith said should finish strong in the meet.

"Erin should be competing for an All-American finish," Smith said. "If she does what she has done so far this season, she can be an All-American."

In the winter season, Anderson performed well, tying for first in the Big 12 indoor track and field championship with a vault of 13-1.5. She will be competing at 5:30 p.m. today.

The Cats also will be competing in the distance-medley relay.

The team of Amy Mortimer, Korene Hinds, Rachel Woods and Amanda Crouse will compete in the distance-medley relay. Mortimer and Woods also will be competing in individual events. Woods will be competing in the mile race, and Mortimer will compete in the 3,000 meters.

Meanwhile, Anna Whitham will be competing in the weight throw. It will be Whitham's final meet, because she only red-shirted half a season her freshman year.

"These people are at an elite level right now, and they are trained for the national meet," Smith said.

He said if the athletes perform like they have previously this season, that they should do well in the national meet.

"Our focus in the indoor season is to get these girls at a level where they can compete," Smith said. "Our goal is to get them peaking at the time of the Big 12 and national indoor meet."

"In indoor competition our goal is to succeed and then build on the indoor season into the outdoor season."

The meet is scheduled for today and Saturday in Fayetteville, Ark.

Wrestling club travels to Texas for nationals

By JEFF CALDWELL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Seven K-State student club wrestlers will be venturing to the Lone Star state this weekend with one goal in mind — victory.

These seven men are the members of the K-State wrestling club who will be traveling to Dallas, Texas, to compete on Friday and Saturday in the national wrestling tournament at Richland College.

The road to the national championship has not been an easy one for the wrestlers.

Despite taking second place at the Southwestern Conference championship on Feb. 25 and 26 at Texas A&M in College Station, not one wrestler took home a gold medal.

"We did that without a championship," Coach Harold Jagerson said. "I really do think they did a fine job down there, especially when dealing with the strong adversity."

Chris Warren, sophomore in agricultural business and co-captain of the team, said the tournament featured some very skilled opposition.

"It was a tough tournament," he said. "We wrestled hard but made some minor mistakes."

Warren also said the team has been working hard since the conference tournament in preparation for nationals.

"We really stepped it up this week," he said. "We have put in a lot of work and really have been focused on our goal."

Jagerson said he believes the team has a good chance to be victorious at the national tournament, even among some stiff competition.

"We have a solid group going, but the competition will be tough," he said. "After all, it is the national tournament."

Warren said he also knows the tournament will be tough, but he said that they are ready for it. The team has been training and wrestling since last September, and Warren said this has been on their minds throughout.

"I know it's been on my mind, but I feel we are ready for it," he said. "This is what we've been training for. It's the climax of our season."

Disc golf tournament set for weekend

By JEFF CALDWELL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Disc golf might not be thought of as a mainstream sport, but those who enjoy the game now have a new place to fling their discs in Manhattan.

The Manhattan Disc Golf Club, the creation of three K-State students, was started in the summer of 1999 to accommodate disc golfers in Manhattan.

"We are all college students who were tired of playing the campus course with all its distractions, complications and shortcomings," said Andy Klaasmeyer, club president and junior in computer science.

Klaasmeyer, along with Jason Springer, junior in business administration, and Brandon Heath, senior in sociology, began the non-profit organization because they decided to do something about the lack of places to play in the Manhattan area.

Klaasmeyer said the campus course has a number of shortcomings and referred to it as "certainly not what disc golf is all about."

Even though the club was created in summer 1999, it didn't have a home course until November 1999, when the course at Tuttle Creek State Park opened.

Klaasmeyer said finding a location for the course was difficult.

"CiCo Park was a great location, but after meeting with city and county officials on several occasions, we were denied permission to build there," he said.

However, there was enough support in the community that the course eventually was built. Klaasmeyer, Springer and Heath signed a 5-year contract with Kansas Wildlife and Parks and began construction.

"Tuttle Creek employees worked in cooperation with us, providing invaluable support," Klaasmeyer said.

Even though he said that there are an estimated 30 disc golfers on the course each day, some of whom travel here from Topeka, Emporia, the Kansas City area and Wichita, Klaasmeyer said the club members have been working to improve the course and to strengthen the club.

A number of new amenities are scheduled to be installed at the course, including concrete tee pads, a message board and benches. The concrete tee pads, which will be the next addition to the course, will be funded in part by the upcoming tournament.

The Manhattan Disc Golf Club Tournament, which is scheduled for this Saturday and Sunday, will be patterned after both the World Golf Championships that recently took place and the NCAA men's basketball tournament.

"By combining the two, we came up with a new and fun tournament format," Klaasmeyer said.

The tournament will consist of 32 golfers competing in five rounds of match play until one champion emerges. The participants are matched up according to scores, which can be submitted on the club's Web site, www.MDGC.net until March 10. Prizes will be given away to competitors during each round.

Mitch Moss, junior in economics, said he has played disc golf off and on for seven years. He said he enjoys playing on the Tuttle Creek course and is looking forward to playing in the tournament.

"I think it is a fun way to get outside and compete in a sport that I enjoy," he said.

Moss said there was a small course in his hometown that he has played on with his friends, but he hasn't ever really competed at this level before.

"It will be interesting to see how I match up against other players," he said.

Klaasmeyer said he and the other club members are looking forward to the upcoming tournament and their organization's future.

"We hope to target the new golfers in Manhattan with this tournament and give them a chance to compete against new people," he said. "MDGC is always looking for new ways to improve the game."

7 charged in nationwide car-theft ring

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Seven people, including the personal assistant to Kansas City Chiefs kick returner Tamarick Vanover, have been charged as part of a nationwide car-theft ring.

A federal indictment, unsealed Wednesday, alleged the seven stole up to 50 luxury vehicles, particularly BMWs and Lexuses, from North Carolina. The cars then allegedly were retitled in Missouri and sold across the country.

The ring allegedly stole more than $1 million worth of luxury sport-utility vehicles since January 1996.

The indictments are part of a related investigation of drug dealers who shipped cocaine and marijuana to Kansas City.

Vanover is not included in the indictment, which a grand jury returned in late February, but Vanover's personal assistant, Gregory E. Burns, was accused in the indictment unsealed Wednesday. Burns already is facing federal drug-trafficking and weapons charges in a related case.

Burns appeared Wednesday at two court hearings to answer charges in the stolen car and drug cases. He pleaded innocent to all counts.

Court records filed in Burns' unrelated federal drug trafficking case show that in March 1998 he sold a 1994 white Lexus SC400 that had been stolen in North Carolina to a cocaine customer in Vanover's presence.

Wednesday's indictment listed a 1994 white Lexus SC400 as among the vehicles stolen in North Carolina. The indictment, however, does not say the Lexus is the same car Burns sold.

According to the indictment, the defendants conspired to steal vehicles from North Carolina, sometimes from car dealerships, and transported them to Washington, D.C., where their vehicle identification numbers were altered. The vehicles then were retitled in Missouri under the false numbers and sold.

Authorities have recovered 20 of the stolen vehicles from Arizona, California, Florida, Missouri, North Carolina, Ohio, Virginia and Washington, D.C.

MENTOR

The skits are also a good opportunity for students to get in front of a group of people to work on their public-speaking skills.

"It's hard to teach students self-esteem," Perz said. "We want them to have a positive experience that will improve their self-esteem when they get in front of their peers at these activities."

The students' self-esteem also improves when they spend time with their mentors, Perz said. Khrist Ried, an eighth-grader at Eisenhower Middle School, said his mentor is more than just a mentor — he's a friend.

Ried was ordered by the court to attend mentoring sessions at the UFM after he got into trouble in the sixth grade. Ried said he chose to continue participating in the mentoring program because he has fun spending time with his mentor.

"I've learned a lot from my mentors, like how to be more responsible," he said. "I've also been able to see how college kids organize their life, and what I need to do to get into college someday."

Some mentors invest more time in their students than what's required, Perz said.

This past weekend, Ried's mentor showed him around his fraternity house and took him to a softball tournament.

Charles Purma, senior in political science, said he makes a point to see his student on Saturday afternoons to play pool, watch videos or go out to eat.

"As a mentor, my role is to be there for my student," Purma said. "I want to be an ear for the kids to talk to when they need to get something off their chest. An extra meeting provides one more opportunity for them to express their thoughts and feelings."

Purma said mentoring benefits him as well.

"It breaks up the monotony of college life," he said. "I've become more human since I started mentoring. I understand things better than I ever thought possible."

In some ways, mentoring a student is like having children, Perz said.

"From the moment I wake up until right before I go to sleep, I'm wondering how my students are doing," she said. "It's definitely not a 9-to-5 job. I may be trying to study for a final when a student calls with a serious problem. I never turn them away, no matter what I'm doing. Sometimes you have to make sacrifices."

The sacrifices are worth it, Kerstan Crowe, junior in secondary Spanish education, said.

"It can be stressful and frustrating at times," Crowe said. "But those times are highly outweighed by the personal satisfaction you gain from helping youth who are in some not-so-ideal situations."

One of the biggest obstacles Crowe faces is differentiating the line between being a friend and being an authority figure.

"It's difficult to listen without taking action, but sometimes that's the right thing to do," Crowe said. "Other times, the right thing to do is to take action, and not listen."

Even though the mentors don't always agree with the things the students are doing, Purma said he has learned to be more tolerant.

"You have to accept what they do before you can help them adjust their actions," he said. "You have to be understanding and have realistic expectations. Mentoring is not for everyone."

Perz said mentoring is easy if mentors can be satisfied by the little steps. It becomes difficult when mentors expect to see a complete turnaround in the student.

"It's the little things that matter the most at this level," she said. "To get a student to open up, commit to the program and trust you means more than anything else."

At first, Clifford Cookman, an eighth-grader at Eisenhower Middle School, was angry when the judge ordered him to attend mentoring sessions at the UFM.

"I was tossed into it without really wanting to do it," Cookman said. "Everyone was so different here. You were put into this group of people that had kids who thought they were cool, outcasts who really didn't care what people thought, and had asses that always wanted to start a fight."

"But, after I started coming to the sessions, I began enjoying it more. I've made some friends now and know some people I can talk to."

Learning how to deal with all kinds of people is part of the program, Perz said.

"We want them to build new relationships," Perz said. "When the students walk into the UFM, they get a clean slate. It doesn't matter if they don't fit in at school or if they've committed terrible crimes; in our program we're all equal and learn how to work as a team to get things done."

programs are continually under review and revision."

Pence said she only had spoken with four students looking for assistance with their DARS reports.

"We're working to identify any particular problems and make any necessary corrections," she said.

A universitywide DARS meeting took place Wednesday. The monthly meeting allows representatives from each college to discuss the system, Woodard said.

Employees of information systems reported that DARS had received almost 1,200 visits by students interested in the program, but college representatives said they were not coming across many students who found fault in the program.

"Most reported that they had not received many calls," Woodard said.

Kevin Donnelly, assistant dean of agriculture, said more than 50 percent of the students enrolled in his college were able to access DARS.

"It's a fairly diverse curricula, so it's taking a little longer to get them all up and running," he said. "Our goal is to have them all on sometime this semester."

Donnelly said he understood the anxiety students might feel about their inability to access DARS, but academic advisers were available to aid them in their graduation plans.

"There's some kind of frustration for students in some majors, but it doesn't mean they're going to be delayed in any way," he said.

Woodard said the registrar's office was picking up the pace in its updates of the DARS page.

"We're constantly working on it," she said.

The same rules apply in the runoff as they do in all K-State elections: in order for a winner to be declared, one ticket must receive more than 50 percent of the vote total.

Preparing for Monday means spreading the word to as many students as possible, McCurry said.

"We're going to be doing as much face-to-face stuff and as much interaction as we can," he said. "We're going to go talk to some residence halls and do everything we can until Monday."

Worcester said he and Pracht were planning several activities to prepare for Monday's election.

"We're going to hang posters and do some more chalking to get ready for Monday," he said. "Of course, the thing that's most difficult about a runoff is getting people motivated to go back out and vote."

Morgan said that even though the larger election was over, the important decision concerning student government was still left to be made.

"I hope the same students come out to vote in the runoff as they did in the general election," he said. "It's just as important to cast your ballot in the runoff."

Among the activities scheduled for the remaining candidates, the KSDB-FM 91.9 will allow the presidential hopefuls airtime during a debate at 6 p.m. Sunday.

Ruskabank members perform at Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon. Ruskabank, a local ska band, will perform Saturday at the Wareham Opera House as part of the 8-band concert for the K-State chapter of Amnesty International.

music for Africa

K-State Amnesty International chapter to raise funds at Saturday concert

Local music will help an international cause.

The K-State chapter of Amnesty International is sponsoring a concert Saturday at the Wareham Opera House. The lineup consists of eight bands and is for all ages.

"Following up on a very successful fund-raising concert last year, we are trying once again to raise money through an all-ages concert," said Naomi Wood, professor of English and a concert coordinator. "Last year's event, we felt, met a genuine community need for a place for teens to go and listen to music. Approximately 300 people came to listen to the music, and we hope to do even better this year."

Amnesty International is a non-partisan worldwide movement working for the international protection of human rights. The release of people detained because of their beliefs, color, sex, ethnicity or language, provided they are not associated with violence, is the organization's main goal. The group is in opposition to the death penalty, political killings, torture and cruel or inhumane treatment of prisoners without reservation.

This year's concert will be in support of the victims of the civil war in Sierra Leone, West Africa.

"Pictures of these people have been in Newsweek, Time and network news," Wood said. "Rebel forces systematically amputated the hands and arms of civilian men, women and children to send a message to the opposing side. Now these people have lost the ability to make a living for themselves. We want to raise money to help them get prosthetic limbs and job training."

Lynn Tufano, junior in English and co-president of the local chapter of Amnesty International, said the concert is a way for people of all ages to participate in the cause.

"I became involved in this organization because a girl in my dorm was the president," Tufano said. "She inspired me to work within the causes that Amnesty advocates."

The concert last year was such a success, and the fact that there are not too many places in Manhattan for an all-ages show with the bands that are involved should make for a repeat of last year.

The bands playing on Saturday night are Ruskabank, Podstar, Moneypenny, Kinder, Sense of Self, Pulse, Egomaniacs and the Blackwater. All are based out of the Manhattan, Lawrence or the Kansas City area. The doors will open at 5:30 p.m., and the music begins at 6 p.m. Admission is $5, and tickets can be purchased at Streetside Records.

The opportunity for the bands to play for an all-age audience, as well as hearing the music of all involved, was a driving factor behind the cause itself.

"We have played in the event for the past three years, and it has just gotten better every year," said Dave Spiker, lead singer of Ruskabank and senior in music. "The crowd is huge, and we just have a ball. This year we would really like to see people from the dorms and the high school participating. This is a great musical opportunity to take advantage of because of all of the talented people involved and at the same time a cause is being fought for."

Amnesty International also is sponsoring a speaker, Paldang Gyasto, a Tibetan monk imprisoned 33 years in Tibet by the Chinese authorities. He will speak on issues of cultural autonomy and the Chinese occupation of Tibet at 8 p.m. Monday in Seaton 63.

Movie screening at Seth Childs Cinema for free

By NATALIA FARMER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

It's the one time Seth Childs Cinema will let students in for free.

Universal Pictures will present a free advance screening of "Erin Brockovich," starring two-time academy award nominee Julia Roberts, live via satellite at 7 p.m. Tuesday at Seth Childs Cinema.

MORE INFO?

Passes are required for the special screening of "Erin Brockovich." They are available at the UPC office on the third floor of the K-State Student Union. You can call 532-6571 for more information.

After losing a settlement in a car accident, Erin Brockovich (Julia Roberts), in a desperate attempt to make money, convinces her attorney, Ed Masry (Albert Finney), to hire her as a clerk.

Discovering misplaced documents, Erin uncovers a community controversy involving the contamination of the local water. With the help of her boss, Harley-Davidson biker-neighbor George (Aaron Eckhart) and the local community Erin pursues the largest settlement ever paid in a direct-action lawsuit.

Shane Brannan, public relations coordinator for Network Event Theater, said 45 schools nationwide take part in this free service that has been offered for the past four years.

Brannan said there are mutual benefits for the audience and movie companies.

"Movie companies love it because it encourages word of mouth and is great for advertising purposes," he said. "The films are geared to a college audience of 18- to 25-year-olds, who are relied upon for their response and grading of the event."

Brannan said larger audiences are best because after the movie, interviews will be conducted with the stars.

"With the new 35mm satellite, the public will get a chance to ask questions after the movie, which is great for feedback purposes and gives us an idea if the movie is going to be successful or not," he said.

The free advance screening is sponsored locally by Union Program Council.

Mike

Rottinghaus,

Feature Films

chairman,

said his committee is responsible for the organization of these movies.

"This is a really good idea because it gets the movie out early and for free, benefiting a number of people," he said. "We usually send information back to the networks and studios."

Rottinghaus said previous performances have been located in the Forum Hall at the K-State Student Union. Due to the new technological expansion of a 35mm satellite, the movies needs to be moved to Seth Childs Cinema for the present time.

Rottinghaus said previous screenings included

"The Green Mile" and "Boiler Room," which were both successful.

"The turnout was great. We had an average of about 550 students in the Forum Hall," he said. "So far, though, it's been good working with Seth Childs Cinema because they have been really cooperative."

Heide McBride, UPC program adviser, said it's effective for the students to see free movies.

"I like this idea because the student discount has been taken away, and there has been an increase in the cost of movies," she said. "It gives everybody a chance to see a performance."

Memphis mourns slain officials

By TERESA M. WALKER
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MEMPHIS, Tenn. — Memphis was a city in mourning Thursday — flags were at half-staff, bouquets of flowers were placed on fire hall steps, and firefighters and law officers wore black bands across their badges.

All were in memory of two firefighters and a sheriff's deputy who were slain Wednesday — allegedly by one of their comrades, firefighter Fred Williams — in a rampage that has angered and saddened this Mississippi River city.

"It's just so shocking," said Pam McFarlin, who took food to firefighters at Fire Station No. 55 and brought a bouquet of flowers to the home where the men were shot. "We all just feel so bad."

Williams, 41, ambushed the firefighters as they arrived to fight a blaze at his home, authorities said.

Williams' wife, Stacey, was found shot to death in the garage.

Investigators said they still were looking for a motive. They were trying to determine whether Williams set the fire to lure firefighters to the home, or to cover up his wife's death. It was also unclear whether Williams made the 911 call to report the fire, Police Director Walter Crews said.

Williams, a six-year veteran of the Fire Department, was shot in the groin by a police officer when he refused to put down his weapon, authorities said. Williams was under police guard at a hospital in critical condition. Authorities plan to charge him today but did not give specifics.

Witnesses said that when firefighters arrived at the burning home, Williams ran out of the garage firing a shotgun and screaming, "Get away! Get away!"

Killed were firefighter Lt. Javier Lerma, 41, the son of a Memphis firefighter who died battling a blaze in 1977, and Pvt. William Blakemore, 48, a firefighter who was working for a sick colleague, possibly Williams, Crews said.

Williams did not work at the same station as the men who were killed, but they probably knew each other. Firefighters often cover shifts of sick comrades at other stations, Fire Chief H.J. Pickett said.

Williams had returned to work Monday after taking a leave of absence for employee assistance, Crews said, not providing details. Williams left work early Monday, claiming he was sick, and had not returned for shifts Tuesday or Wednesday.

The fire chief wouldn't discuss Williams' work history or his leave of absence.

Crews said the couple had married on Valentine's Day, and Williams moved into the house this week.

Miller announces use of plastic bottles

By SKIP WOLLENBERG
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Miller Time is coming your way in plastic containers.

The Milwaukee-based brewer announced on Thursday it will sell three of its best-selling beers — Miller Lite, Miller Genuine Draft and Icehouse — nationally in 16-ounce and 20-ounce plastic bottles in addition to traditional glass bottles and aluminum cans.

The nation's second-largest brewer has been testing response to the plastic bottles over the past 18 months in more than a dozen markets and arenas.

While plastic is widely used for beverages like milk and soft drinks, Miller would be the first U.S. brewer to use plastic bottles on such a large scale.

"Plastic bottles represent one of the biggest breakthroughs in the beer world in years and have met with an overwhelmingly positive response," said Miller's top marketing executive, Bob Mikulay.

But others say many beer drinkers find the idea of beer in plastic as cheap. Beer industry leader Anheuser-Busch Inc., had previously tested but rejected using plastic bottles.

Miller spokesman Scott Bussen conceded that there was natural skepticism by beer drinkers to the idea of a plastic beer bottle. But he said tests showed Miller that the wariness tends to melt away when they get a chance to hold the bottle and taste the brew.

He said beer in plastic stays cold longer than in aluminum cans and as long as in glass bottles. Plus, he said, the beer tastes the same.

"Eighty-five percent of the people we asked in a variety of markets said they would buy it again," he said.

Bussen said Miller doesn't expect that plastic will take over, but the new option will enable the brewer to sell beer in sports arenas, music halls or the beach — places where glass or cans may not be permitted.

He said plastic bottles are actually more expensive to make than glass in part because they are thicker than a soda bottle but Miller hopes to reduce the costs as more are produced.

Two recycling groups applauded the move.

"Turning old bottles into new bottles is a step forward, at a time when recycling rates are steadily declining," said Pat Franklin, executive director of the Container Recycling Institute of Washington, D.C.

FOUR AND five-bedroom

10-year-old girl, missing for 3 days, found unharmed in store

By VICKIE CHACHERE
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

GAINESVILLE, Fla. — Three days after she was abducted as she got off her school bus, a 10-year-old girl walked alone into a Wal-Mart 25 miles from her home Thursday and asked for help — ending her ordeal but not the mystery of what happened to her.

A short time after the Wal-Mart employees called police, Jessica Rodriguez jumped into her mother's arms and was smothered with hugs and kisses, Sheriff David Turner said.

Investigators said they believe the child was dropped off outside the Wal-Mart by her captor, but it was still unclear what happened to her while she was missing. Authorities were searching for the man they believed grabbed her from her driveway.

"She's fine, she's talking to mom. She's in good condition," Turner said. "She's one tough, strong little girl. She was very happy to see her mother."

Jessica was taken to a hospital for an examination. Police said they planned to interview her as soon as possible.

The girl was reported snatched by a stranger Monday as she got off the bus with her two younger sisters at their rural home northwest of Gainesville.

Over the next three days, her mother and aunts made tearful public pleas for her return.

Child reunited with family after being snatched Monday by stranger.

Her uncles combed through the woods looking for her, emerging dusty and bloodied from briar scratches.

Word that Jessica had been found alive came as her mother, Jennifer Graham, was undergoing a routine lie-detector test at the sheriff's office, said Sharon Gogerty, a spokeswoman for the Florida Department of Law Enforcement. Turner and Graham immediately left for Gainesville.

"Mom went out screaming," Gogerty said.

"We just want to get her home and hug her," said her uncle Steve Nobles.

Jessica's sisters, ages 4 and 8, told authorities they saw a man grab her from her long dirt driveway in the middle of the afternoon and put her in a green Jeep Cherokee. The bus driver said he never saw the man, nor his Cherokee. A composite drawing of a man in his 30s or 40s was produced using information supplied by the sisters.

Jessica's extended family has lived in the isolated woods northwest of Gainesville for five generations, considering it a safe place to raise children.

"Here in rural Gilchrist County, we don't have crimes of this nature occurring," the sheriff said. "This is an extreme rarity. This is very traumatic for the family and community."

Before her daughter was found Thursday, Graham pleaded for the girl's return on NBC's "Today."

"I love my daughter, and we are all human. And we are praying for both of you. And please bring my baby back home to us," she said.

Graham said she normally met her daughters at the bus stop as a safety precaution. The girls were the last students on the bus in the afternoon, and Graham said she knew it wasn't a good idea to let her guard down.

But on Monday, she said, she had fallen asleep on the couch after working a night shift at a fast-food restaurant and caring for her youngest, a 6-month-old boy. Her fiancé, Thomas Kelley, a mechanic, said he was working in the yard and heard the girls scream. He ran toward them just in time to see the man back out of the driveway and speed off, police said.

Ken Tucker, regional director for the Florida Department of Law Enforcement, said children kidnapped by strangers are rarely found safe.

"I think the sheriff made reference Thursday to the Good Lord — I think he was with us," he said.

DESPITE REFUSING TO RESIGN UNDER ANY CIRCUMSTANCES, COACH TOM ASBURY

STEPS DOWN

Asbury walks away after losing season

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State men's basketball coach Tom Asbury resigned Friday after the Wildcats' 84-60 loss to rival Kansas in the first round of the Phillips 66 Big 12 Tournament in Kansas City, Mo.

Max Urick, director of the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, announced that Asbury's resignation was effective immediately.

"Tom Asbury and his coaching staffs did not come to Kansas State to fail," Urick said. "No one worked harder over the past six seasons to make K-State a successful basketball program. Tom and his staff have represented Kansas State in a very positive manner, which is greatly appreciated."

"We thank Tom, the assistant coaches under him and his players for their combined efforts over the past six seasons. Unfortunately, things don't always work out as we would like them to in every situation. We certainly wish Coach Asbury and his staff the best of luck in the future."

Asbury's resignation came as a surprise, considering he said he wouldn't resign under any circumstances at Wednesday's press conference before the Big 12 Tournament. Many assumed Asbury instead would be fired.

Asbury had been earning $165,000 a year since 1996, when he received a contract extension that has two years remaining.

As of Wednesday, Asbury said he still was under the impression that he was going to have an evaluation meeting with Urick at season's end.

"They indicated that they were going to wait till the season is over, and we'd sit down and evaluate the situation at that time," Asbury said. "We have an evaluation at the end of the year, critiquing the past year and what our needs are, and what our strengths and weaknesses were."

Senior forward Josh Reid said Asbury didn't tell the team whether he was leaving or staying.

"I found out for sure by reading the papers," Reid said. "At first I didn't know if it was all true."

When reached at his home Friday, Urick wouldn't comment directly on Asbury, but did say that Asbury and K-State are working on a financial settlement.

Urick also said that once the arrangement is determined, the details won't be made public.

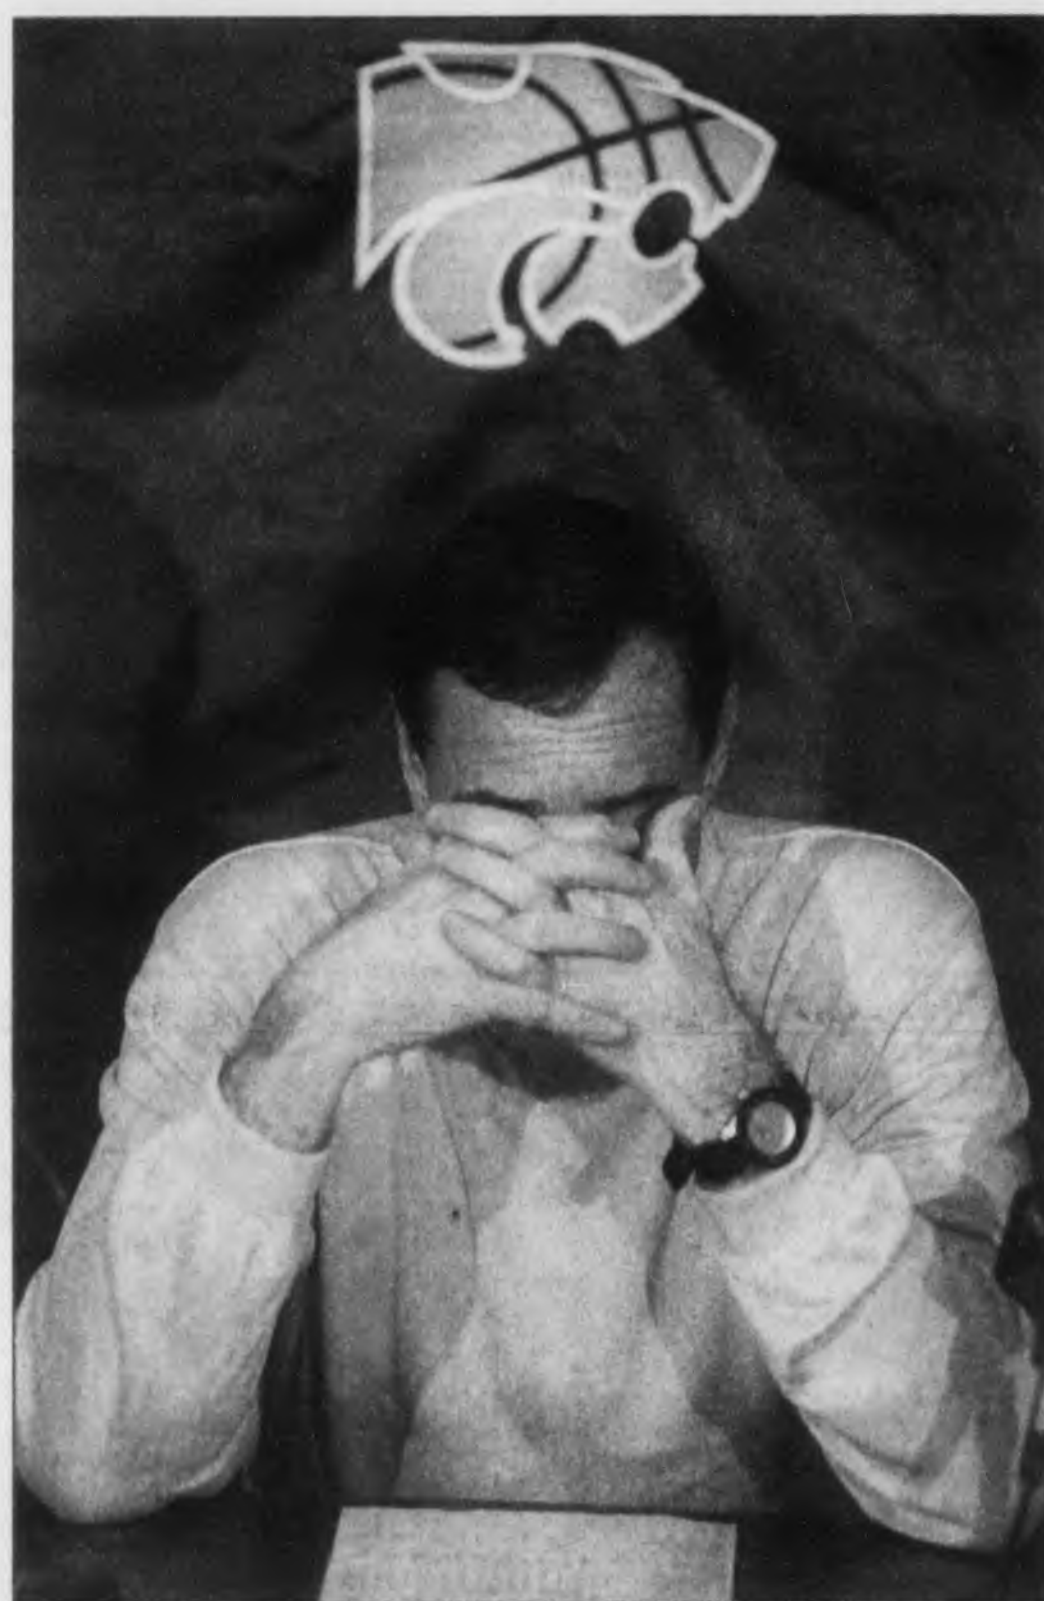

"There is certainly an agreement between the two parties," Urick said. "Everything will be worked out quickly. It will be worked out in due time."

Friday morning's announcement, which came through a press release issued by Urick, said a replacement will be found quickly.

"We have established a small committee to search for and interview candidates," Urick said. "Kansas State will use all available resources to find the best coach possible. Our objective is to develop a successful basketball program that will make K-State fans everywhere proud."

Assistant Bulls coach to be named Asbury's successor

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Chicago Bulls assistant coach Jim Wooldridge will be introduced Tuesday by K-State's Department of Intercollegiate Athletics as the new men's basketball coach at K-State.

K-State Athletic Director Max Urick said only small details remain in the contract negotiations with Wooldridge and that he couldn't foresee anything at this point that could stop Wooldridge from coming to Manhattan.

Though nothing has been signed yet, it has been reported that Wooldridge will receive a five-year contract worth $2 million, which is quite a raise from Asbury's $165,000 a year.

Wooldridge, 43, who was in Manhattan on Saturday, was the first and last candidate to interview for the position. Urick said Wooldridge came highly recommended by Los Angeles Lakers assistant coach Fred "Tex" Winter and Chicago Bulls head coach Tim Floyd, who also played with Wooldridge at Louisiana Tech.

ASBURY IN REVIEW

The following story blurbs from the Collegian archives highlight Tom Asbury's coaching career with the Wildcats.

MARCH 31, 1994: COACH DANA ALTMAN RESIGNS

Coach Dana Altman resigned Thursday evening from K-State and accepted the head basketball coaching job with Creighton University in Omaha, Neb.

Altman, who just completed his fourth season as coach of the Wildcats, made the move to Creighton the day after the Wildcats ended their season with a loss in the National Invitation Tournament.

APRIL 12, 1994: PEPPERDINE'S TOM ASBURY SIGNS CONTRACT WITH K-STATE

Asbury had coached the Waves for six seasons and led them to three NCAA Tournaments and two National Invitation Tournament berths. While at Pepperdine, Asbury had never won fewer than 17 games in a season and has had four 20-win seasons.

MARCH 12, 1998: CATS END FIRST REGULAR SEASON UNDER ASBURY WITH LOSS TO KANSAS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — When K-State entered the Big Eight Tournament as the No. 8 seed, the Wildcats knew their basketball season was surviving merely on life support. The Cats were defeated 90-45 to end their conference season.

MARCH 15, 1998: CATS' BIG DANCE ENDS QUICKLY

RICHMOND, VA. — Twenty-one points separated K-State and New Mexico after the first-round game of the NCAA Tournament.

It was those 21 points that sent the Wildcats back to Manhattan as the Lobos stunned the Cats, 69-48.

JANUARY 22, 1997: "FRUSTRATED AND PISSED OFF"

AMES, IOWA — The Wildcats fell to the Cyclones Wednesday night in Ames, and team consensus is woefully clear.

"I'm frustrated and pissed off," Asbury said. "I'm just fed up with this from our team — maybe when we get sick enough, we will start winning."

MARCH 6, 1997: K-STATE'S FIRST BIG 12 BASKETBALL TOURNAMENT OVER IN ONE GAME

The same thing that doomed the K-State men's basketball team all year long doomed it once again in its Big 12 Tournament debut — shooting percentage.

MARCH 6, 1999: CATS LOSE IN THIRD ROUND OF BIG 12 TOURNAMENT TO JAYHAWKS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The third time was almost a charm.

MARCH 10, 1999: NIT TRIP ENDS AFTER FIRST GAME

Lee Nailon and Texas Christian University stormed into Bramlage Coliseum and dashed the post-season dreams of the K-State men's basketball team.

OCT. 13, 1999: LOOKING AHEAD TO 1999-2000 SEASON

Men's basketball team will sport a new look this season after replacing eight players.

When the K-State men's basketball team takes the floor for the first time Nov. 5, don't arrive with preconceived notions that this Wildcat team will be like any in years past.

MARCH 8, 2000: WILL HE RESIGN? ASBURY SAYS "NO"

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — K-State men's basketball coach Tom Asbury said Wednesday that he will not resign following the season with a to-the-point "No."

MARCH 9, 2000: SEASON ENDS AFTER 84-60 LOSS TO KU

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Since the inception of the Phillips 66 Big 12 Tournament, the No. 12 seed never has won, and Thursday was no different as the No. 5 seed Kansas Jayhawks defeated the K-State Wildcats 84-60 at Kemper Arena in the first round.

MARCH 10, 2000: ASBURY LEAVES K-STATE HOURS AFTER SEASON'S END

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — K-State men's basketball coach Tom Asbury resigned today after leading the Wildcats to their third losing season in his sixth year as coach.

Teens charged with murder in drive-by retaliation case

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — The three juveniles accused of killing two people in what authorities believe was retaliation for a 1998 drive-by shooting have been ordered to stand trial as adults.

Keith Mays, 16, his cousin Shawndell Mays, 17, and Carvelle England, 16, each has been charged with two counts of first-degree murder.

They are accused of killing Joseph Morton, 21, and Christopher Union, 33, in shootings authorities believe were retaliation for a drive-by shooting in October 1998 that killed 10-year-old Shanelle Cooper.

Curtis Coleman, 15, was the only person convicted in Shanelle's death. He was tried as an adult, found guilty of first-degree murder and sentenced to life in prison with no chance for parole for 40 years.

But Coleman was just one of several people in the car from which the fatal shots were fired. The car had stopped to let Shanelle and two of her cousins cross the street before the shots rang out.

Wyandotte County Prosecutor Nick Tomasic said the deaths of Morton and Union also could have been cases of mistaken identity.

On Jan. 24, Morton was gunned down on a city street. Two days later, Union and a companion were fired on as they sat in a parked pickup.

Besides the three to stand trial as adults, four others were charged in the murders. Michael B. White and Ronald Weaver, both 18, were charged in the two slayings. Sampson England, 18, was charged in Morton's death, and Peter J. Davis, 19, was charged in Union's death.

Fundamentalists, women rally over women's rights

RABAT, Morocco — Hundreds of thousands of Muslim fundamentalists and representatives of women's groups took to the streets of two Moroccan cities on Sunday, having opposing rallies over a government plan to give women more rights.

The plan, which would offer women greater educational opportunities and help those going through divorce, drew what observers estimated to be at least 500,000 fundamentalists to Casablanca in protest.

"We defend Islam with our bodies and souls," the crowds chanted as they marched — men and women in separate columns — through downtown Casablanca under the eyes of police and soldiers. "Men and women are equal before God," they chanted.

The fundamentalists, some crying "Allah Akbar" (God is great) and holding aloft the Koran, the Muslim holy book, denounced the plan as anti-Muslim.

Officials said the Casablanca march drew about 200,000 people, but observers said more than double that number attended the rally, which was supported by the Justice and Spirituality movement of Abdesslam Yassine.

In the capital city of Rabat, just north of Casablanca, between 200,000 and 300,000 people representing women's groups, human-rights movements and political parties marched in support of the plan, some chanting, "No to reactionaries." At least six government ministers took part in the march, which ended with a concert.

Among other things, the plan fully would replace the practice of repudiation, or automatic divorce by a husband, with court divorces and provide for equal division of money and property. It also would support a literacy program for rural Moroccan women, 60 percent of whom are illiterate.

However, the plan sharply has divided Moroccans in the year since it was unveiled in March 1999.

The Rabat march long had been planned to roughly coincide with International Women's Day, celebrated last Wednesday. Then, last week, Muslim fundamentalists announced their own plans for a counter-march.

Yassine has been under house arrest outside Rabat for a decade, but his movement has grown increasingly vocal since King Mohammed VI took the throne following the death of his father, King Hassan II, last July.

The new monarch has moved quickly to bring a variety of social and human rights reforms to his kingdom.

Army, Air Force ROTC members gather for ball

By BEN HOPPER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Army and Air Force ROTC members recently were recognized for possessing dedication, discipline, patriotism and integrity.

The joint military ball, the main social event for ROTC, took place in the Union Main Ballroom on Friday.

"It is a social event for cadets to spend time together outside of class and labs," said Melissa McDonald, senior in mechanical engineering and Air Force ROTC cadet.

McDonald, who helped organize the ball, said the event occurs every other year.

"There are certain ceremonies, a dinner and dance," she said.

A Saber Guard ceremony for commissionees and a presentation of the colors were two ceremonies that took place.

Jeff Mann, junior in agronomy and color guard member, presented the Kansas flag.

Mann, who has been in the Army ROTC for three years, said he enjoyed the ceremony and likes the prestige of being in the military.

"I was almost crying when hearing Lee Greenwood's 'I'm Proud to be an American,'" Mann said. "It's pride: pride in myself and our country."

Retired Maj. Paul Montague was the guest speaker. He served in the Marine Corps and was a prisoner of war during the Vietnam War.

The POW/MIA ceremony honored those who have yet to return from the battle field.

Kent Crane, junior in parks and resource management, is in the Air Force

He said the ball is original because it's one of the only joint functions between the two groups at K-State.

"It's a formal chance for the Air Force and Army to recognize the seniors as they leave for active duty," Crane said. "It's a training experience to get younger cadets ready for active duty as well."

Cathy Winter, one of the 26 seniors who were recognized, co-organized the event. Winter, senior in accounting, previously served 7 1/2 years active duty.

"Originally, I wanted the educational benefits, but through my first enlistment, I found I liked the Army," Winter said.

"There are a lot of good people in the military."

Student found dead at home

By DANEDRI THOMPSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A K-State graduate student was found dead in her apartment Thursday afternoon.

Ping Zhang, graduate student in agricultural economics and international student from China, apparently hung herself, Riley County Police Sgt. Tim Hegarty said.

According to a press release, police found her body at about 1 p.m. Thursday after friends told police they had not seen Zhang for a few days, and she had missed a test.

The coroner estimated the time of death to be about 2 a.m. Wednesday.

Donna Davis, director of the International Student Center, said Zhang had suffered from depression for a long time.

"I think her friends and family knew that she had suffered from depression long before she came to the U.S.," she said. "She just couldn't overcome that depression."

Scott Jones, assistant dean of student of life, said there probably won't be a memorial service for Zhang until members of her family arrive from China.

He said the family doesn't have passports, but the International Student Center is working with the Chinese and U.S. governments to help make travel arrangements.

For any students feeling a sense of loss at Zhang's death, University Counseling Services accepts walk-in appointments and scheduled appointments, he said.

"We encourage anyone with a sense of loss or grief that is keeping them from accomplishing their goals to talk to someone about it," he said.

The International Student Center and the Chinese Student Association have created a memorial fund to help Zhang's family defray the costs of international travel and funeral expenses.

Students can make contributions to the Ping Zhang Memorial Fund by calling the KSU Foundation or taking checks to the International Student Center or the Office of International Programs in Fairchild 304.

"International travel has a lot of complications on short notice," Jones said.

Increasing price of gasoline poses threat to local shipping businesses

By CRISTINA JANNEY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Buchanans can hold out only a little bit longer.

The high gas prices are costing the Manhattan family trucking business $100 a day.

Robert C. Buchanan Inc. trucking hauls agriculture products. The company is keeping prices steady for their regular customers, but they can do that only for a few more weeks if gas prices remain the same or go up, Alma Buchanan, co-owner, said.

"The part that bothers me is that commodities are already so low," she said.

The company ships crops from elevators to processing plants. If the company has to raise shipping prices, the elevators will not be able to offer farmers as much for their crops, Buchanan said.

That could be devastating for farmers who already are struggling in a slumping farm economy.

"It is bad for the Kansas economy," she said. "We are a farming state."

The company has five trucks, and it already is difficult to compete without the added burden of the high gas prices, Buchanan said.

Phillip Parker, co-owner of We Deliver Courier, said he also has to watch expenses for his small Manhattan company.

"I am nothing without my vehicles, and my vehicles need gasoline," he said.

Parker said he has not yet felt the effects of the price increases, but he said he was concerned about rumors that gas prices could go as high as $2 a gallon.

He has his delivery drivers fill up in surrounding cities such as Junction City, Lawrence or Salina, Kan. because gas prices run 5 to 10 cents cheaper in those cities, he said.

"I am going to try to beat it any way I can," he said.

Prices have had limited effects on automobile sales.

Jim Gaidos, sales manager at Dick Edwards Ford, said his customers were not really mentioning the gas prices right now, but that might change if prices continue to increase.

The overall strength in the economy might be softening the blow of the higher gas prices, he said.

Gaidos said this upswing in prices is small compared to the increases of the 1970's gas crisis. Cars also were much less gas efficient at that time.

Brian Boyda, salesperson for Briggs Auto Group, said people still are buying the gas-guzzling sports utility vehicles.

"Anyone who can afford a sport utility vehicle, can afford the gas," he said.

But 30 days is not long enough to have an effect, he said.

Jim Clark Chevy Olds Pontiac Cadillac Jeep, a car dealership in Junction City, offered free gas for a year with the purchase of a car for one day in February because of the gas price increases.

Tony Cepeda, sales and leasing consultant for Jim Clark, said he thought the dealers would start seeing people trading in their gas-hog vehicles like trucks for more economical cars.

"I have noticed an awareness about fuel economy now," he said.

Students should take advantage of runoff election

Students have one more chance to be heard.

Polls are open from 8 a.m. to 6 p.m. today to vote in the runoff election for student body president and vice president. The vote follows Wednesday's general election, in which candidates Jake Worcester and Dana Pracht received 35 percent of the vote, compared to 16 percent for second-place finishers Jesse McCurry and Kylo Heller.

Because no ticket achieved a majority — one more than 50 percent — of the votes, the top-two candidates will face off again today.

Although more students voted in this election than have voted in an election without a referendum in more than 20 years, turnout still amounted only to about 16 percent of the student body population.

This is pathetic.

The student body president and vice president are the two most important positions students can have at K-State. They not only push legislation through Student Senate, they also interact with faculty, city officials, the Kansas Board of Regents and the state Legislature.

These two individuals represent the entire student body in their roles as president and vice president. They often are students' sole voice in state and local government. They are K-State. Obviously, this is an important responsibility. Yet only 16 percent of students found it worthwhile to cast their ballots.

So what is the problem?

Laziness.

Students simply don't care enough to turn on their computer — or visit one on campus — and log onto KATS. The entire process, including starting up the computer, might take three minutes, tops. Convincing students to vote in today's election brings an added problem. Worcester and Pracht lead the general election by a wide margin and seem out of reach for McCurry and Heller.

That is not true.

Last year, presidential candidate Leo Prieto came within 115 votes of upsetting winner Jason Heinrich in the runoff, only days after Heinrich finished the general election 65 votes shy of an outright victory.

Obviously, McCurry is within reach. He needs the votes of all of his supporters if he is going to catch Worcester, the front-runner.

Worcester, meanwhile, needs every vote he can get if he is going to hold off a charge by McCurry.

Whoever you support, they need you.

Cast your vote now, or be stuck with whoever the rest of campus chooses for you.

A Game of Give and Take

K-State's current method of administering exams illogical, detrimental to students

You think you're safe, and you have the situation under control. You think you can handle it. You tell yourself it's OK.

You can handle two tests and a paper this week.

No problem. Then they hit you with two more tests and another paper, but where are they coming from?

The conclusion I have come to is that all the teachers and professors get together and come up with a good day to make everything due. The history teachers and the English teachers get together with the sociology teachers and biology teachers with the intent on making my life and yours a nightmare.

If you haven't yet figured out what my complaint is, it is that no one adequately can prepare for tests and papers the way class schedules are set up now.

Here's the scenario. I know someone who, since last Tuesday, had five tests. Five. I might be alone here, but that sounds like an extraordinary amount of tests in four days.

Now, we have to take into account the level of course work this person has. For the most part, these tests are not in History 100 or English 100. This is not to say those tests are not hard, too, but there is a certain level of elevated difficulty in a higher level class that requires more preparation come test time.

Personally, I just have been faced with a similar problem. On one day, I have a significant paper due, a midterm essay due and an in-class midterm. Plus, the next day I have an article due for one of my journalism classes. I admit my situation is a little better because I have the weekend at my disposal, but it still seems like a lot of work.

What ends up happening to me, and I'm sure it happens to every other student, is I have to prioritize my work. I will say the ability to prioritize is a good skill to possess. However, in school work, putting one class's work aside for another almost always is detrimental to the student's mental health as well as his or her grade.

Besides, there is absolutely no reason this should have to occur. It is ridiculous to have to tell yourself one class is more important to another when, in reality, all are meaningful in some way.

Maybe the class goes toward your major, so you have to do well. But that required history class is equally important if not because you have to pass, then because you paid good money for it. Personally, I would rather eat David Levin's maggot-meat than pay for the same class twice because I failed the first time.

Then you fall behind in the class you put aside and thus have to make it first priority, which makes you behind in your other classes, and so on and so forth. It is just an ugly, vicious cycle, and something should be done.

Teachers most likely would say to prepare better. However, I feel that, with the amount of work that goes into each test, paper or whatever added onto the regular course work, added onto outside employment (which most students have) is too much to prepare for. I'm not saying instructors should give us less work, but to prepare for five tests in two weeks in advance and still keep up with everything else is nearly impossible.

Teachers also probably would say there is no other way. They have a right to teach their class at the pace they choose and give examinations and assign papers at appropriate times. I don't disagree, but how come all the teachers get to an exam point on the same day?

I say we should have a regular exam schedule for all tests, not just finals. Every department should have certain days when they can give the exams.

Then you don't get an English test, an agriculture test, a psychology test and a biology exam all on the same day or two days.

Oh, wait. Then you run into the problem of people in their junior and senior year who take all marketing classes for their major or all business classes.

So, I guess the exam schedule wouldn't work for them. Still, there's got to be something that can be done, aside from imbibing gallons of coffee and staying up for a week straight.

Any ideas?

VIEWPOINT

KATIE SUTTON

Scientists find faith in nature, mathematics

"This most beautiful system of sun, planets and comets could only proceed from the counsel of and domination of an intelligent and powerful Being"—Isaac Newton.

In statements such as these, mathematician and physicist Isaac Newton repeatedly stated that his scientific research was motivated by his Christian conviction that God created the world, and therefore the study of nature ultimately would glorify God.

Newton was not alone in this sentiment. For all his disagreements with church officials, Galileo Galilei was strengthened, rather than discouraged, in his faith by his scientific studies; he once said that the book of nature was "written by the hand of God in the language of mathematics." Likewise, Copernicus, who first proposed that the sun was the center of the solar system; Johannes Kepler, who discovered that the orbits of the planets were ellipses; biologists Carl Linnaeus and Georges Cuvier; Blaise Pascal, inventor of the first calculator; and James Maxwell, who formulated the laws of electromagnetism, all were Christians who often saw direct connections between science and their faith.

This brings up an oft-overlooked fact of history: that what we know as modern science actually grew out of a Christian worldview. In their book "The Soul of Science," science writer Nancy Pearcey and physical chemist Dr. Charles Thaxton point out three key elements in the Christian worldview that served as a foundation for the development of science.

The first is that the physical world is real, not an illusion as most Eastern cultures had taught. Believing that the world was real and created by God, Western thinkers began to value the study of nature.

Second, this worldview teaches that nature is good, but it is not divine, in contrast to pagan religions. As Pearcey notes, "When nature commanded religious worship, digging too closely into her secrets was thought to be irreverent. By 'de-deifying' nature, Christianity turned it from an object of fear and worship into a possible object of scientific study."

Third is that nature is orderly and predictable. As Pearcey, writing with Charles Colson, notes, "No other religion or culture, Eastern or Western, has ever used the word law in relation to nature. In fact, before modern times, most people regarded nature as mysterious, dangerous and chaotic. The idea of natural law did not arise from ordinary experience but only from the biblical teaching that God is both Creator and Lawgiver."

As historian R.G. Collingwood writes, "The possibility of an applied mathematics is an expression, in terms of natural science, of the Christian belief that nature is the creation of an omnipotent God." In addition, the biblical teaching that God's thoughts are not our thoughts, nor his ways our ways, prompted scientists to realize that they must use observation and experimentation to investigate the natural world, rather than sitting around and philosophizing about how they thought the world worked.

Yet if you read the proclamations of many modern scientists, you would think that Christianity — or religion of any type, for that matter — was a threat to science. For example, John Maddox, editor of the prestigious journal Nature, said that the time is coming soon when "the practice of religion must be regarded as anti-science."

Or consider the following quotes from several current biology textbooks. "You are an animal, and share a common heritage with earthworms." "Evolution is random and undirected, without either plan or purpose." "Darwin gave biology a sound scientific basis by attributing the diversity of life to natural causes rather than supernatural creation."

What would our scientific forefathers think of such unscientific statements? Probably not much. In fact, much of it is not really science, but naturalistic philosophy, also called naturalism.

Naturalism today is known from Carl Sagan's famous creed, "The Cosmos is all that is or ever was or ever will be," but it first was stated more directly by the 18th-century Scottish philosopher David Hume. In a textbook example of a circular argument, Hume claimed that, "All that occurs, occurs in the laws of nature; therefore miracles, since they are outside the laws of nature, cannot occur."

Naturalism is not science. It is a philosophy that flatly denies both the supernatural and the existence of anything beyond the material world. Truth, beauty, morality and every other human expression is relegated to the subjective and is denied if it cannot be explained in purely mechanical ways.

But naturalism is inherently self-contradicting, for two reasons. First, in order for scientists to carry out experiments and investigate the natural world, they must exempt themselves from being mechanisms operating only according to natural causes. Otherwise, they would not be capable of transcending the natural world and making objective statements about it.

The second problem was pointed out by C.S. Lewis. For any idea to be a genuine truth claim, it must be more than just the result of natural forces. If an idea merely were the result of molecules bumping around in our brains, it is no more valid than the claim of a man on a hallucinogenic drug who thinks his house is on fire; his statement merely is the result of physical and chemical causes in his brain.

What, then, is being done to replace this bankrupt philosophy with sound science that acknowledges the foundations of science itself? I will address that in my next column, two weeks from now.

Habitat home opens to family

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Something better came along for Regena Banks at 2:07 p.m. on Yuma Street on Sunday.

She took the scissors that were offered to her and proceeded to cut the ribbon attached to the post and mailbox of her new house.

"I've never had my own house," she said. "There's a lot of sweat and tears that went into this house."

But sweat and tears came long before her house was built by Manhattan's Habitat for Humanity and its K-State chapter.

Banks arrived in Manhattan in 1993. Her house in another town had suffered flood damage, and her basement had filled up with sewer water. She said she chose to move to Manhattan because she had lived here in 1984 and considered it an open-minded town — something important to her.

"I was a single parent with four biracial kids and no income, no family, and I didn't know anybody," she said. "We moved into public housing. It was horrible."

Her problems didn't stop there. Banks found a job with the city and was the first female at her job.

"I worked with the Parks and Recreation department of maintenance, cleaning bathrooms and shelters," she said. "I hated that job. But every day I worked because I knew I would continue to step up. I was going to work toward something better."

She reached this goal Sunday, when she addressed a crowd of about 50 and told them, with tears in her eyes, how thankful she was.

She also thanked her kids for putting up with her crankiness when she came home late from work and for babysitting when she had to leave.

Banks picked up an application from Habitat for Humanity about three years ago but never thought she would see this day.

"People really don't get houses.

But I took five minutes to fill out the application," she said. "I've always wanted to be a homeowner. By being a single parent, you know you'll never get child support."

A phone call from Habitat for Humanity followed shortly afterward, telling her she was one of the selected families. Banks, however, thought her brother was playing a joke on her.

Debby Christian, Manhattan's Habitat for Humanity president, said Banks' house was one of the seven out of the nine on which it worked.

It organized the dedication ceremony and invited people to tour her new house.

As the crowd thinned out, Banks reached out and hugged Alana Reed.

"I have a feeling we'll be good friends," she said.

Reed had her own ceremony before Banks', when the same 50 people gathered for the groundbreaking of her new house.

She, just like Banks, had applied three years ago but was denied. She reapplied and was chosen out of the many families who live in sub-standard housing.

"It's like winning the lottery," Reed said. "My kids thought I was crazy when I got the phone call because I just started yelling."

However, this was one of her better days.

Reed also has four children and works full time, something that never gets easier, she said.

Although she has family support, Reed said it's hard to find a suitable place to live.

"Sometimes I feel like it's never going to get better," she said. "But God will see you through — I will survive. I will make it."

Now that she'll have a new house, some of her problems will be solved.

Her 8-year-old son no longer will have to share a bedroom with his 2-year-old brother, and she'll have less worries about finances and landlords, she said.

"I'm finally where I'm getting my life together," Reed said.

"Getting this house is where it starts."

This is the reason why Scott McKinney, Americorp Vista volunteer, said he believes in Habitat for Humanity.

"It doesn't just treat the symptoms of poverty," he said. "It gives them a tangible level of wealth. They won't be dumping their money on rent every month."

McKinney said the Habitat Board of Directors selects two families every year who meet their financial requirements. Recipients have to be able to pay the zero-percent mortgage, but they have to be below a certain income level, he said.

The board also visits the families' houses to verify that they have housing needs.

The ninth house that is being built for Reed, however, is unique because it's the first full-scale partnership between Manhattan and K-State's Habitat for Humanity, McKinney said.

Jon Anderson, president of the K-State chapter and senior in construction science, said they've had fund-raisers and raffles to help fund the building, something he said he enjoys.

"I like seeing students, like education majors, swing a hammer," he said. "Just to see the happiness of someone doing something new is amazing. For me, helping out families is a Christian thing to do."

Providing a sense of community is the reason Christian said she's involved.

"For me, it's going back to community-building," she said. "There's a willingness to help, but not always a willingness to be in charge."

Banks showed appreciation for all their work when she read a poem titled "A gift beyond comparison" at her dedication ceremony.

She thanked them for their friendship and for their work.

"Thank you for becoming a friend, not just another face. ... Thank you for giving my family a place for their heads to rest," she said.

Luau celebrates Asian heritage

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Various cultures and age groups gathered together Saturday night in a warm, family-like atmosphere to celebrate Asian-American Heritage Month.

About 50 people attended the luau, which included a wide variety of foods, hula-dancing, live music, a limbo contest and door prizes. The event took place in the International Student Center.

"We are trying to bring the islands here," said Cindy Seto, senior in finance and president of the Asian American Student Union. "It's relaxed and fun."

After eating pineapple ham on toothpicks, sweet and sour pork, Chinese sausage, teriyaki pork, fruit salad and drinking "maui wau" punch, dancers of all ages took center stage.

The hula-dancers wore leis around their necks, tube-tops and grass skirts.

"Everyone should be exposed to this type of culture," said Terry Brinkley, who helped organize the performance.

Joe Camoriano, Manhattan resident, joined the celebration with his wife and four of his children. He participated in the limbo contest.

Once all of the contestants but Camoriano were eliminated, he inched his way under the limbo pole, which hung about 2 1/2 feet from the ground, and was declared the winner.

"It was a great time to see a lot of cultures come together and have fun," Camoriano said.

Philip Lin, graduate student in computer science, also attended the party. He said the food was great, and the hula-dancing was fantastic.

"We want everyone to know that Asian culture is in America," Lin said.

Seto said Asian-American Heritage Month is important because there are a lot of cliques on campus. She said students moving east or west after graduation could be close-minded to other cultures.

"There are a lot of people who want to be educated and exposed to other cultures," she said.

Seto said this is the ninth year the AASU has sponsored the month's events.

This year's theme is "The Year of the Dragon: Individuality From Our Cultures, Wisdom Through Our Unity," Seto said.

"Each Asian culture has their own identity and wisdom," Seto said. "We can learn our faults and how to improve the world around us."

WILDCATS IN REVIEW

Men's basketball season ends with loss in Big 12 Tournament

The 1999-2000 season spelled doom for K-State men's basketball head coach Tom Asbury, who resigned the day after the season ended.

It was a season of ups and downs for the K-State men's basketball team.

Unfortunately, the ups were few and far between for the Wildcats in the competitive Big 12 Conference.

Yet players such as senior Tony Kitt won't dwell on the many disappointments the team's endured this season, which included a 2-14 conference record.

"Through good and bad times, we've always stuck together," Kitt said after the Cats' 99-70 loss to Texas in the regular season finale. "That one family that we have in that locker room has always been there for each other. I wouldn't trade that for nothing."

K-State jumped out to an impressive 5-1 start, with notable victories over Saint Louis, New Orleans and Memphis.

Although the Cats only won two of their next five contests, they still had a formidable 7-4 record heading into conference action.

Against Nebraska in the Big 12 opener Jan. 8, the Cats stunned the Cornhuskers with a 97-79 thrashing at Bramlage Coliseum.

In that game, guard Galen Morrison scored a career-high 27 points and hit 7-of-9 from three-point range. Senior guard Cortez Groves added 24 points and provided the Cats a double-threat from beyond the arc, shooting 5-of-11 from downtown.

The win heightened the Cats' momentum and earned the team some well-deserved respect.

Then it all fell apart.

K-State plummeted to the bottom of the Big 12 Conference, losing 14 of the next 15 games, including 11 straight following the Nebraska victory.

The 11 consecutive losses tied the K-State school record set in the 1945-46 season.

The Cats weren't even able to muster a Jan. 29 win against Nebraska in Lincoln, despite pounding the Huskers Galen Morrison drives in for a lay-up against Nebraska in the Wildcats' first home Big 12 game of the year.

K-State opened the season with an 88-69 loss to the ninth-ranked Arizona Wildcats in the first round of the Preseason NIT.

The Cats register their first win of the season with a 76-61 victory over Northwestern (La.) State. Tony Kitt posts a double-double in the Cat's first home game of the year.

K-State senior forward Josh Reid breaks his foot in practice. The three-point specialist would miss two months with the injury.

Junior point guard Galen Morrison scores a career-high 27 points in the Cats' first Big 12 game of the season. The Cats beat Nebraska 97-79 at home. Morrison's performance earns him Big 12 Player of the Week honors.

K-State overcomes an 18-point halftime deficit and leads Kansas 79-78 late in the game. However, the Cats fade in the last 1:30 and fall to KU 87-79. Sophomore Travis Reynolds suffers a severe high ankle sprain against Kansas and misses three weeks with the injury.

Coaching decision made too quickly by Urick, K-State

When Max Urick, K-State athletic director, accepted men's basketball head coach Tom Asbury's resignation, he took the proverbial monkey off Asbury's back and put it on his.

Yes, now Urick is the one on the clock, with the K-State basketball community waiting for his final answer. He is the one who will make the final call on a new head coach.

That much is clear if you listen to K-State president Jon Wefald. "You would have to talk to Max Urick — he is the athletic director, OK, and I delegate to him, just like he is the dean of a college," Wefald said.

Wow, Wefald has a lot of faith in Urick, and it looks as though the decision has been made.

Uruck and the athletic department will hire Chicago Bulls assistant coach Jim Woodridge.

Let's hope for the sake of K-State athletics that he is making the right choice.

Uruck is on the hot seat. He is in that position because this hiring is the biggest decision the university will make with regards to athletics this year and possibly this decade.

VIEWPOINT

NICK BRATKOVIC

If K-State hires the right coach, it could again become a basketball power. It could be a place where recruits are willing to come.

Imagine, will you, after watching a week-end of great games between competitive schools, that one of those schools was K-State. The Cats need to regain respectability.

Imagine being able to go to Bramlage Coliseum excited about the game you are going to watch. Picture, if you will, the tournament brackets being released, and the Cats in the NCAA Tournament field.

Imagine buying combo tickets because you want to go to basketball games, not just because it is the only way to get a football ticket. Imagine, and this really is what the athletic department wants, a basketball program that sells out every game.

Finally, imagine beating Kansas. I realize those things, especially the last one, seem like a world away, but you can dream.

However, Uruck can ill afford to dream; he needs to deal with reality and needs to hire the best possible candidate. Is Woodridge the best possible candidate? I don't know. Fred "Tex" Winter and Tim Floyd seem to think so, but I still question a decision this soon.

It looks like the nationwide search, one of the quickest in history, is officially over. The decision has come fast, and too quickly. I am not sure a final answer this fast, is really a long enough period to find the best possible candidate.

Let's hope Woodridge is a coach who can recruit, coach, discipline and help fans continue to imagine.

It is imperative right now that he can, because if the university wants to take steps forward in athletics, a winning basketball program to complement K-State head football coach Bill Snyder's empire is essential.

If Uruck wants to complete the baseball stadium and give K-State head baseball coach Mike Clark the palace he deserves, then he needs a winning basketball program.

If the university wants to support equality and intends to be Title IX compliant, then a winning basketball program is essential.

If Uruck wants to satisfy alumni and continue to draw high donations from the Mike Ahearn Scholarship fund, then a winning basketball program is essential. The bottom line is that Uruck needs to come forward and take charge of his department. He needs to be vocal in this process and inspire people to believe. A press release is insufficient when you are in a time of flux.

Uruck needs to give Woodridge the necessary tools to compete.

Uruck also needs to give a speech similar to a State of the Union address, but instead the state of K-State athletics. He needs to give the loyal alumni an idea of where these different programs are going.

Because right now, all that anyone knows for sure is that the football team is going to be pretty good next year, and that our basketball program has a coach who had less than a .500 record in his last head coaching job.

Uruck and the K-State brain trust need to tell us how they plan to battle their way out.

Right now, it looks like the first step is Woodridge, but where do we go from there? Uruck and the K-State athletic brain trust need to answer those questions, and let's hope we like the answers.

The Cats end the regular season with a 99-70 loss at home to the Texas Longhorns. K-State finishes the season 9-18, 2-14 in Big 12 games. The loss ensures K-State of being last place in the Big 12.

K-State's losing streak is halted with an 81-76 win at home against Texas A&M. Cortez Groves leads the Cats with 30 points. The victory gives the Cats a winning home record for the season, extending their NCAA record of consecutive years with a home winning record to 54 years.

Galen Morrison is suspended from the team for the remainder of the season for disciplinary reasons. K-State loses its 11th straight game. Missouri hits 12 first-half three-pointers en route to an 84-74 victory over K-State.

K-State head basketball coach Tom Asbury's resignation has left those people close to the program with one thing to say — nothing. Asbury resigned unceremoniously in a press release and was unable to be reached at his home.

K-State assistant coach Mark Fox would not comment Friday on the coaching change. When asked about his plans, Fox said they were up in the air.

"I don't know — we will have to wait and see," Fox said.

Asbury is the second straight K-State men's basketball coach to resign. He follows Dana Altman, who while in Manhattan experienced limited success at K-State and resigned after the 1993-94 season.

One of Altman's former players, Anthony Beane, said at the time that the coaches dealt with most of the problems regarding the future. "I never really gave it that much thought," he said. "The coaches did a good job of keeping us away from those type of things."

Beane, now an assistant coach at Southeast Missouri State, said that with the passage of six years, he doesn't know if Altman regrets not being more successful at K-State.

"I am pretty sure that he would have loved to have been more successful there," Beane said. "Of course he is having success now."

Today, Altman and the Creighton Bluejays are preparing for their second straight NCAA appearance, and they have won the Missouri Valley Conference tournament to advance. They finished this regular season at 23-9.

K-State Athletic Director Max Uruck would not offer any additional comment to his initial release. He was the only person available to comment on the matter.

K-State President Jon Wefald has maintained all along that Uruck would make all comment on the matter.

Baseball team falls to Nebraska in 1st Big 12 series

By SAM STIERS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It was a rough weekend for the K-State baseball team.

The Cats lost two-of-three games against the University of Nebraska.

The Wildcats (5-12, 1-7) started the weekend off with their first Big 12 win of the season, then dropped the next two games by a combined score of 28-4.

Pitcher Kurt Lehrmann was supposed to start for the Cats on Sunday, but head coach Mike Clark said Lehrmann came up with a bad arm before game time. The injury forced Chad Duckers into the starting role and added to the Cats' frustration.

"We started the series with nine healthy pitchers — now we're down to six," Clark said. "I don't know who we're going to throw on Tuesday."

Clark said that while he is disappointed in the team's 12-4 loss Sunday, he is pleased with his team's effort.

"The kids hustled, they competed hard, they're just very frustrated right now, and as coaches we're very frustrated," Clark said. "We'll just have to keep competing hard, and people are going to have to step up. If we compete like we did today, we'll be fine."

Sunday, the Cats trailed the entire game. A home run by catcher

Graham McAllister helped the Cats stay close for most of the game, but K-State could not capitalize on several scoring opportunities and stranded five runners in the sixth and seventh innings.

Entering the eighth inning, the Cats trailed 5-4, when Nebraska first baseman Dan Johnson hit a three-run home run off pitcher Todd Lundwall in the eighth, and the Cornhuskers added four runs off relief pitcher

Scott Tallman in the ninth to put the game out of reach.

"We're down one more pitcher," Clark said. "We threw just about everybody we had healthy. We had three available pitchers, and we used the three we had."

Pitching continued to be a problem for K-State. K-State's pitchers on Saturday gave up 16 earned runs and 12 walks and on Sunday gave up 11 earned runs and eight walks.

K-State's pitching highlight of the series was the performance of sophomore pitcher Luke Robertson, who struck out 13 batters in the Cats' 4-3 win Friday.

The Cats also struggled offensively during the series. The team was held to two hits in Saturday's 16-0 defeat.

K-State's next game will be at 2 p.m. Tuesday at home against Doane.

SEASON

by 18 less than a month before.

However, K-State did accomplish one feat that preserved the Cats record in the NCAA history books.

K-State's 81-76 victory over Texas A&M on Feb. 23 sealed the Cats' 54th consecutive winning season at home — an NCAA record. K-State went 8-7 this year at Bramlage.

Against the Aggies, Groves poured in 30 points and sank 8-of-12 from three-point range. Kitt complimented Groves' performance, adding 21 points for the game.

At the season's end, K-State watched three seniors play their final games as Wildcats. Groves, Kitt and Josh Reid donned the purple and white for the last time this past weekend.

Reid said he's had a great career at K-State and has no regrets, despite missing 10 games of his senior season due to injury.

"It was a little more emotional than I thought it would be for me," Reid said after the Texas contest. "I look at my mom and dad, and we've all been talking about this since I was a little kid — it's finally over."

The three seniors all will leave their marks in the K-State record books after their stellar careers.

Reid and Groves finished in the top seven in Cat history in three-pointers made, attempted and percentage, as well as in the top 15 in steals. Kitt retired in the top six in career blocked shots and field goal percentage.

Groves' 16.2 points per game during the regular season marked the highest scoring average by a Wildcat since Elliot Hatcher in 1995-96.

As the season came to a close, Kitt could do nothing more than smile and reflect on the lifelong experiences he'll remember as a Wildcat.

"I love every minute that we had, win or lose," Kitt said. "We all cried together. We all shared tears together. We all won together. For me, that experience outlasts anything."

2nd Amnesty benefit concert draws large crowd

■ 8 bands, pizza, prizes attracts 300 supporters to aid worldwide group.

By TARYN FORT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

History has a way of repeating itself.

The Amnesty International Benefit on Saturday night at the Wareham Opera House was a success for a second year.

Eight bands, free pizza and door prizes were the highlights of the fund-raising event.

High school students as well as K-State students attended the all-ages show.

EVAN SEMON/COLLEGIAN

Josh Collicho, lead singer of the Kansas City-based rock band Pulse, opens its set at the Amnesty International Benefit on Saturday night at the Wareham Opera House.

"The high school kids have been talking about the concert all week," Ben Trenary, Manhattan High School freshman, said.

"We are supporting the local music scene any time that it can be made available to us. The idea to incorporate local bands for a benefit like this was just really good idea."

The concert brought out about 300 people to advocate

Amnesty International's support in Sierra Leone, West Africa.

"After two hours, we already have half of the amount of people that we had total for last year," Naomi Wood, professor of English, said. "I am hoping that even more show up as the night goes on."

Bands from Manhattan, Lawrence and the Kansas City area were a part of the music venue for the night.

and Zach Popejoy of the Lawrence-based band Kinder said they took part in the benefit for several reasons.

"This is such a worthwhile cause, and politics is enough of an interest of ours that we grabbed the chance to help out," Popejoy said.

Behrends said: "I know that there probably will not be too much money raised, but that seems to be beside the point. If nothing else, this event is raising awareness of the situation in Africa."

"It is raising awareness that Amnesty International is a part of this community and college town," he said.

Ruskabank and The Ego-maniacs were two of the acts returning from last year's concert.

"We became aware of this benefit through some friends that asked us to fill in at the last minute for last year's concert, so when they asked again this year, we took up the rare opportunity," said John Evans, lead vocalist for The Egomaniacs. "We have an album coming out in April, and the exposure is great, but doing it for a worthwhile cause just adds to the positiveness of tonight."

"This has become not only a benefit for a good cause, it is also a hometown benefit allowing the public to come and witness all of the talent that is present here in Manhattan. To be able to do both things at once, all in front of an all-

Amnesty International literature and pamphlets were available for the audience. The K-State chapter of the organization also was looking for new members and volunteers to help with other local events.

The next event sponsored by Amnesty International will be a Advance training class sells horses at K-State auction over weekend

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The auctioneer warned the crowd at the Kansas Cowboy Arena to bid loudly on horses.

"If the ringman don't see you, wave it big and wave it loud," he said.

But this wasn't the only warning the auctioneer gave the crowd Saturday afternoon.

You'd better buy this colt and three others, he said. Their owner, Elaine, is going home in a car because her trailer already left.

This marked the beginning of the horse auction K-State students and faculty had been working on.

Randy Raub, associate professor of animal sciences and industry, has been teaching the advanced horse training class since 1989.

"I just love horses, first of all. It's nice to get paid to do something you really love," he said. "I like watching the progress of students and the horses they're training."

His class allows students to work with one or two horses in the fall and spring terms, which gives them an opportunity to get the horse ready for sale, he said.

Most K-State students work with horses to sell them, but sometimes they are asked to train horses already owned by individuals.

It costs these owners $600 a semester, and they are charged a $200 consignment fee if they decide to sell the horse. Raub said the money they receive from this goes toward the horse unit.

However, not all students have the same background and preparation, something that Raub said is frustrating.

"Most have some degree of experience, but some are pretty green," he said. "It's really hard to communicate to somebody your experience. You're working with another living, breathing being. The horse is the ultimate teacher."

Leos Bullet, then, would be considered the ultimate teacher. He was part of the U.S. army's mounted color guard — he has seen and done more than the average horse, his lineage paper read.

Todd Wright, senior in animal science, has been training Leos for a month. Wright said it wouldn't bother him if his horse got sold because he wasn't that attached to him.

"He's 8 years old and kind of set in his ways," he said.

But Leah Kroencke, senior in animal science, felt differently about her horse, Fancy. She bought the horse last semester because she grew so attached to her.

Kroencke now is working with Silver, a gray mare she said she doesn't want to keep.

"She's definitely moody, but she's a pretty good horse," Kroencke said. "It's an exciting atmosphere, and it's time for her to go."

Kroencke said she enjoys the class because she gets to work outside with horses and learn more about training them.

"What class can you be outside for two hours and do something you really enjoy?" she said.

Jeni Peck, a Clay Center, Kan., resident, was walking past Silver when she stopped to talk to other interested buyers.

"Hopefully, there will be good horse flesh," she said. "You just never know when you find something you need."

Peck has six horses and one on the way, but not for competition or for showing.

Although she used to show a lot, she buys horses now for pleasure.

"It's called a love. You never get over it," she said. "I need to collect things. Horses just happen to be what I collect."

This wasn't Steve Wesley's case.

Wesley is from the Salina, Kan., area, where he bought a small ranch in 1992.

In addition to having three horses and a colt on the way, he also has some cattle and stock dogs.

He's interested in buying horses for competition and for ranch work, but he also loves just riding horses, he said.

"It's like therapy," Wesley said. "It's a chance to get away from everything, to have your thoughts to yourself and to work out the kinks in life."

Clinton, Guiliani meet at benefit roast

By BETH J. HARPAZ
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — First lady Hillary Rodham Clinton passed another initiation rite in her adopted state, laughing throughout a spoof on New York politics that made a lot of jokes — some of them crude — at her expense.

Her Republican Senate rival, Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, also was roasted at the annual event staged by political reporters, but he nearly stole the show with his own scripted performance in full drag — blonde wig, dress, makeup.

Saturday night's event was the first time the mayor and first lady had met face-to-face since she began campaigning here more than a year ago.

They shook hands and exchanged pleasantries when she entered the room at the New York Hilton, but when she walked away, he turned to reporters and said: "I'm very, very encouraged that we are drawing a lot of out-of-towners to this performance."

During intermission, they bumped into each other backstage as they greeted the cast.

"I hear you're the star," Clinton told the mayor.

"We're gonna see, we're gonna see," he replied.

"I can't wait to see it," she said.

The annual show — a $400-a-head black-tie dinner that benefits homeless shelters, soup kitchens, educational programs and other local charities — is renowned for its rollicking tastelessness and outrageous jokes.

One gag featured the Hillary character taking a subway to Shea Stadium "where I can watch my favorite team, the New York Yankees!"

When a rider explained that the Yankees actually play in Yankee Stadium, the Hillary character answered: "Sorry ... We live in Chappaqua now, you know. That's Indian for 'The Land of Separate Bedrooms.'"

Clinton laughed heartily at the joke and smiled and applauded throughout the evening, though she grimaced when her character asked for directions to Times Square and said: "My husband wants me to pick up a few things for him at the Virgin Megastore."

The show's plot also featured a hapless Hillary being hauled off to jail for campaigning in Times Square, while the Rudy character picked on homeless people. President Clinton showed up, but instead of bailing out his wife, he sprung an actress and left Hillary in the slammer.

As Clinton got up from her table during intermission, she remarked with a laugh: "I'm still standing."

MISSION

COURTESY PHOTOS

Dazzling special effects outweigh lack of plot in De Palma's latest film

By KELLY FURNAS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Do you remember how there was a lot of hype around "Star Wars: Episode I — The Phantom Menace," and when it finally came out, the general consensus was that the movie was missing a lot, but still was pretty cool because of its special effects? Remember that?

It has happened again. This time, the movie is "Mission to Mars," but the missing parts are all the same — story, dialogue and acting. The movie could have been the next in line of great science-fiction epics, which include everything from "2001: A Space Odyssey," to "Independence Day." Instead, there are too many pieces missing from the film.

Directed by Brian De Palma ("Mission: Impossible" and "Snake Eyes"), "Mission to Mars" tells the story of the first manned mission to Mars. When a mysterious disaster kills some of the crew, however, a rescue party is dispatched to recover survivors and research the original catastrophe.

Some fine actors are in this film, including Gary Sinise, Don Cheadle and Tim Robbins. Ultimately, their performances are negated from the film because of a storyline with too many gaps. For example, the movie begins with the astronauts reminiscing about the planned mission, then cuts 13 months later to the mission, already in progress. It seems like some of the most valuable plot developments are completely cut from the movie, and the audience is left to assume what actually happened.

The movie still gets high marks — extremely high marks — for sounds and visuals that had an obviously strong financial backing. If for nothing else, this movie needs to be seen in theaters to take advantage of the most realistic-looking space voyage to date.

Although the effects are dazzling and probably are the best reasons to see the movie, they probably are what hurt the movie most in the end.

There seems to be an attitude in this movie that the viewer should be paying attention to the effects first and the story second.

Pointless scenes have been created just to show off the fact that actors are working without gravity and that the set has been constructed with a tremendous attention to detail.

Viewers probably even can sense a hint of arrogance in the presentation of the movie.

Producers and studios can throw as much money at a film as they want, buying the best effects, best actors and best director. But if the emphasis from the start is going to be to make the movie look pretty, it always will be doomed to a mediocre existence in the minds of viewers.

"Mission to Mars" is a movie that will get a lot of wows, but it won't be considered an epic because viewers have no reason to go see the movie again.

'The Ninth Gate' hauntingly entertaining despite director's risks

By KELLY FURNAS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Director Roman Polanski should be applauded for a tremendous amount of bravery in the creation of his latest movie.

"The Ninth Gate" follows a rare-book dealer (Johnny Depp) who is investigating a demon text with only three known copies in existence. His search and investigation, however, draw the attention of others with satanic interests.

Polanski takes an awful amount of risks. He expects the viewer to be able to pick up extremely small clues that are integral to the plot. He doesn't dress up scenes beyond necessity — to the point that they almost seem dull.

For example, the opening scene shows an elderly man writing, then quickly pans to a foot rest sitting in the middle of the room. The camera stays on the foot rest for several moments — perhaps too many moments — before panning up and showing a noose hanging from a ceiling fixture. The treatment is risky — Polanski could just have shown the man committing suicide and not confused viewers.

By far his biggest risk, however, is an ending that will leave 99 percent of the viewers saying, "That's it?" The ending definitely retains the movie's adherence to being vague and aloof. Most viewers, however, will expect some payoff for sitting through 2 1/2 hours of intrigue and be disappointed. Essentially, it's Hollywood's version of "The Blair Witch Project," except with a discernible plot.

Despite the ending, however, the movie is an accomplishment of courageous filmmaking. Polanski has created a movie with such a delicate linear progression of tension, it almost serves as a workout for the viewer. It's a safe bet that any viewer's heart rate goes up a couple of beats a minute for every 20 minutes of the movie.

A lot of credit goes to Depp, who is wonderful as usual. There's nothing particularly amazing about the performance, except for the fact that he is 100 percent believable in the role.

Another interesting performance is given by Emmanuelle Seigner (who's credited in the movie only as "The Girl"). Seigner plays an extremely creepy woman who follows Depp's character around during his investigation. With hardly any lines, Seigner does a neat job of playing such a complex character in the movie.

However, the most noticeable performance is by the orchestra performing Wojciech Kilar's original score. Kilar provides the exact music needed for the film — haunting, tense and sometimes even curious. If music alone could tell the story, this score would do it.

"The Ninth Gate" has everything going for it for four-fifths of the movie. And although the ending is disillusioning, it does not detract from the movie's other triumphant elements.

Strait's newest album provides traditional country for variety of music fans

By SARAH McCaffrey
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

George Strait's "Latest Greatest Straitest Hits" album is a compilation of songs from 1994 to '99. Featured on the compact disc are two new songs, "The Best Day" and "Murder on Music Row," as well as 13 other Strait classics.

"The Best Day" is Strait's latest song with No. 1 potential. The song is about a father remembering some of the most significant moments in his son's life. You don't have to be a parent to relate to this song. The thought-provoking lyrics make the listener contemplate the days cherished in life so far.

Strait's other new song, "Murder on Music Row," is a commentary on the current state of country music. This duet with Alan Jackson laments the commercialization of the country-music industry. Strait and Jackson whine about the shift toward country incorporating more of a rock sound. Strait basically accuses the newer country artists of being sellouts to traditional country

Music review

George Strait
"Latest Greatest Straitest Hits" simply because they are trying to please their audiences.

The majority of the songs on the CD focus on love. The album can be split into two categories: being in love, and being burned by love.

Songs like "Carrying Your Love

With Me," "Carried Away," and "One Night at a Time" make up the slow, traditional-sounding portion of the falling-in-love category.

Strait also includes a group of upbeat, catchy songs about how great it is to be in love. "Adalida" and "We Really Shouldn't Be Doing This" are peppy dance tunes that any good two-stepper would love.

Other songs like "I Can Still Make Cheyenne" and "You Can't Make a Heart Love Somebody" also fall under the slow and traditional country sound, but these are songs about finding love and then losing it. Strait can make even the coldest heart share in his painful lamentations with his soulful lyrical depictions of heartache and loss.

This traditional-country compilation offers a contrast to the new pop-country sound that is gaining popularity on the air waves. From the perspective of a musician, you really can't go wrong when you release a greatest hits album. Strait's latest will appeal not only to established fans but also to listeners who dabble in country and want a taste of something seasoned and smooth.

Pope asks for forgiveness for sins of Catholic church

By CANDICE HUGHES
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

VATICAN CITY — In an unprecedented moment in the history of the church, Pope John Paul II asked God's forgiveness Sunday for the sins of Roman Catholics throughout the ages, including wrongs inflicted on Jews, women and minorities.

The apology was a personal landmark for a frail, ailing pope who vowed to cleanse and reinvigorate Catholicism for its third millennium.

"We forgive and we ask forgiveness," he said at several points during the solemn Day of Pardon Mass at St. Peter's Basilica.

The church burned heretics at the stake during the Inquisition. Armies of the faithful slaughtered Muslims during the Crusades. And during the Holocaust, some Catholics stood silent in the face of Nazi genocide.

The pontiff did not specifically mention such infamous wrongs during the service. Few specific groups were mentioned, and no names were given.

Still, the references were clear, both in John Paul's words and those of the five Vatican cardinals and two bishops who confessed sins on behalf of the church.

Cardinal Edward Cassidy recalled the sufferings of the people of Israel and asked divine pardon for "the sins committed by a not a few (Catholics) against the people of the Covenant."

After a moment of silent prayer, the pope responded: "We are deeply saddened by the behavior of those who in the course of history have caused these children of yours to suffer, and asking your forgiveness, we wish to commit ourselves to genuine brotherhood."

Several Jewish leaders praised his penitential words, but said they expected more during the pope's March 20-26 visit to the Holy Land.

During his trip, the pontiff will visit Israel's Holocaust memorial, Yad Vashem, and the Western Wall, the holiest site in Judaism.

The director of Yad Vashem, Avner Shalev, called Sunday's day of pardon both significant and historic. But "he has to pay tribute and commemorate the remembrance of the Holocaust, and I know he will do it," Shalev said in Jerusalem.

Israel's chief rabbi, Meir Lau, also said he expects more and described himself as deeply frustrated by John Paul's failure to mention the Holocaust by name.

"I hope deeply that the pope of today, whom I appreciate very much for his doings and for his condemning anti-Semitism, will complete the asking of forgiveness next week in Yad Vashem in Jerusalem," Lau said.

The 79-year-old pope was dressed Sunday in heavy purple robes, the color of penitence. He leaned on his silver staff, his voice clear but his hands trembling, a symptom of Parkinson's disease.

At the end of the confessions, he embraced a large crucifix on the altar for the special Mass, imploring God's forgiveness.

"We are asking pardon for the divisions among Christians, for the use of violence that some have committed in the service of truth and for attitudes of mistrust and hostility assumed toward followers of other religions," John Paul said in his homily.

The cardinals and bishops, also wearing purple, cited "contempt for (other) cultures and religious traditions," and the treatment of women, "who are all too often humiliated and marginalized."

It fell to the head of the Inquisition's modern-day successor, Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, to confess sins committed in the service of the truth.

"Even men of the church, in the name of faith and morals, have sometimes used methods not in keeping with the Gospel," he confessed. "Have mercy on your sinful children," the pope responded.

John Paul described his actions as an attempt to purify memory of a sad history of hate, rivalry, intolerance and omission. The special Mass was a highlight of his campaign for a collective examination of conscience at the dawn of the new millennium.

One of the few groups mentioned by name at Sunday's Mass was the Roma, also known as Gypsies, in a confession of hatred toward the weakest members of society. Lapses by Catholics regarding abortion, mistreatment of children and those who abuse the promise of biotechnology also were mentioned.

Catholic leaders around the world have offered their own pleas for pardon for various lapses. Bishops in Europe have acknowledged that not enough was done to save Jews during World War II. In the United States, church leaders have confessed a host of sins, including racism, anti-Semitism, the sexual misconduct of priests and the treatment of homosexuals and divorced Catholics.

"We are deeply saddened by the behavior of those who in the course of history have caused these children of yours to suffer."

— Pope John Paul II

made at noon Tuesday.

Asbury experienced his third losing season this year in his six at K-State as the Cats went 9-19 overall, and 2-14 in conference.

However, Asbury did guide three K-State teams to postseason tournaments. In 1996, the Cats made their 22nd appearance in the NCAA Tournament, and in 1998 and 1999, K-State competed in the National Invitation Tournament.

This season was K-State's worst season since 1945-46, when the Cats went 4-20 under head coach Fritz Knorr.

Asbury, who was 85-88 at K-State, is the first coach since Knorr to leave K-State with an overall losing record.

The release also said any comment from Asbury would have to come directly from him. Attempts to reach Asbury over the weekend at his Manhattan home were unsuccessful.

WOOLDRIDGE

for the new coach, said the Saturday interview with Wooldridge went well.

"He was in yesterday and interviewed," Erick said Sunday from his home. "He is a very impressive individual."

Wooldridge, whose Bulls are the worst team in the NBA at 13-48, said Friday following the Bulls' 104-74 loss to the Boston Celtics that leaving the Bulls is hard to do.

"Leaving the Bulls' organization as I go through this process is a tough thing to do," he said. "They're great people and have treated me better than I could have hoped for — that's the tough part."

Wooldridge didn't fare too well in his last stint as a head coach at Louisiana Tech, where he compiled a 52-59 record. Before that job, Wooldridge was head coach at Southwest Texas State from 1991-94. He also was head coach at Central Missouri State, where he enjoyed the most success of his career with a 131-48 record.

Wooldridge is considered the Bulls' coaching staff expert on the triangle, or triple-post, offense. Winter designed the triangle offense while at K-State during the 1950s and 1960s, when he led the Wildcats to two NCAA Final Four appearances.

The short list of candidates, which seemed shorter and shorter every time it was reported, also included Gary Garner of Southeast Missouri State, and Winter, who won six NBA World Championships with the Bulls in the 1990s.

Former K-State player Rolando Blackman, a two-time All-American and Big Eight Player of the Year at K-State in the early 1980s and a 14-year NBA veteran, said he would have liked to be come back to K-State as coach, but said Erick hasn't returned his phone calls.

"I had the hardest time ever getting a hold of anybody," Blackman said Saturday from his home in Texas. "Nobody would call me back. I understand, though. The process is going on the way K-State officials want it to go on."

"I'm just sorry that I didn't have the opportunity to be a part of the process."

Blackman said he had not been aware K-State had begun searching for a replacement before the end of the season, despite comments throughout the season from Erick saying no decisions regarding Asbury would be made until the present season was over, and Erick had time to meet with the coaching staff.

"Out of respect to Tom, and not wanting to embarrass him, I didn't do anything earlier," Blackman said. "I didn't know K-State's search process started months and months ago."

"If I did, maybe I would've thrown my name in the hat earlier."

Blackman, whose jersey was retired Saturday night by the Dallas Mavericks, said it's time for him to move on with his life — just as K-State has.

"Sure, I had the opportunity to think about the job and dream about it, but they have apparently already made their decision," Blackman said.

Student body supports Asbury resignation

By JENNIFER GIER

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tom Asbury is history. Asbury's resignation as K-State head men's basketball coach has seemed to strike many different emotions in K-State students. For months, students have been vocal in their opinions of how the K-State basketball season was going and Asbury's coaching failures.

Ann Barrows, sophomore in pre-nursing, said Asbury's decision came at an opportune time.

"I'm glad to see that he decided it was time, because he hasn't turned in a winning program in years," she said. "He recruits people whose only skills are streetball skills, and that doesn't transfer to the basketball court."

Asbury, who submitted his resignation Friday, coached K-State for six years with an overall record of 85-88.

Shawn Buessing, junior in electrical engineering, said he did not attend K-State basketball games because he was not interested in the games because of the team's losing record. Buessing said Asbury's resignation was a good thing.

"He's had his chance," Buessing

Tom Asbury, seen here in K-State's regular season finale against Texas on March 4, resigned Friday after a first-round loss to Kansas in the Big 12 Tournament in Kansas City, Mo. The loss left the Wildcats' basketball team with a 9-19 record, the worst since the 1945-46 season.

MIKE SHEPHERD/ COLLEGIAN

said. "Now it's time to go."

Many students said they knew the end was coming for Asbury. David Molamphy, senior in construction science and management, said Asbury's resignation was expected because of his continual struggles the past couple of years.

Shanna Shaw, senior in elementary education, said she knew this would be Asbury's last year because although he has been given several chances to succeed, he didn't make a winning team.

Max Erick, director of the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, said in a press release that a national search for K-State's next basketball coach is under way.

Although the athletic department has its ideas about the next coach, students have some of their own sentiments on who should be hired as coach. Past players, NBA coaches and college coaches are just a few of the suggestions students have mentioned since Asbury turned in his resignation.

Molamphy said he thinks Chicago Bulls assistant coach Jim Wooldridge would be a good choice because he has a proven reputation and would be able to get the team on track.

The athletic department is expected to announce a new men's basketball head coach Tuesday.

DEBATE

ideas and comments, much like the Collegian's Campus Forum.

"I think it will help shed new light on issues," he said.

Worcester said the Student Senate already has a hotline.

McCurry said the hotline had not been promoted enough or more people would be using it.

McCurry and Heller also want to communicate better with students by using Channel 8 and developing a fall on-campus pep rally.

"We want more pride on campus," he said.

Worcester and Pracht said they want to support existing events like Purple Power Play on Poyntz and Wildcat Welcome Week.

Perhaps the greatest gap between the candidates is their stances on a Student Activity Center.

The center would be an addition to the K-State Student Union and would have space for all student groups on campus. The center would cost $5-7 per student on their privilege fees, Worcester said.

McCurry said student groups already have enough meeting space, and it would be unlikely that those groups would want to move from their current meeting places.

Pracht said it is not the physical space that is the focus.

"We are focusing on the communication and interaction between students," she said.

Worcester said students were not aware of the resources available to them. This project would help that situation and encourage joint projects between groups.

"We don't feel that students are getting the support they need," he said.

McCurry said if student groups were not aware of resources available to them, that was student government's fault for not communicating better with them.

He said student government was trying to force a project on students that they did not want.

Pracht said the project would go to a vote of the students and would require 60-percent approval to pass.

Worcester and Pracht also support making transcripts available online and a university authentication system, which would allow students who are not on the K-State network to access campus resources.

Both groups of candidates supported a shuttle system, better advising, increasing the diversity in student government and keeping tuition increases at a reasonable rate.

Worcester and Pracht said they were looking at programs that benefit students over the long haul.

"We will look to the future," Worcester said. "We need to have people in leadership who will look to the future."

Heller said he and McCurry's platform is more realistic and contains projects that students will feel right away.

"You are going to feel the benefit from the things we do on a day-to-day basis," Heller said.

"Our goal is to find one little thing that is going to make your day easier."

McCurry, Heller unable to claim runoff election

By CRISTINA JANNEY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jesse McCurry and Kylo Heller narrowed the gap but could not overtake Jake Worcester and Dana Pracht to win the student body presidency Monday.

"They are quality candidates and good people who I respect. I congratulate them," McCurry said to a group of disappointed supporters at Elements of Taste in Aggieville.

A groan came from the crowd every time a song delayed the announcement of the results that were supposed to be given over the radio at 7 p.m.

The candidates were on the verge of celebration when Senate Elections Chair Travis Morgan announced that the results were surprising.

But the numbers came down on the side of Worcester and Pracht, who received 1,078 votes to McCurry and Heller's 785.

Wooldridge officially named new men's basketball coach

By JOSHUA KINDER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State Athletic Director Max Urlick formally announced Monday that Chicago Bulls assistant coach Jim Wooldridge will succeed Tom Asbury, who resigned Friday following the Wildcats' first-round elimination from the Phillips 66 Big 12 Tournament.

WOOLDRIDGE

In Friday's press release, Urlick said K-State would form a small committee to conduct a national coaching search, a search that ended less than 24 hours after Asbury's resignation.

Sunday, Urlick confirmed that the national search started and ended with Wooldridge, whose Bulls have the NBA's worst record at 13-49. However, in Monday's release naming Wooldridge as head coach, Urlick said there is no doubt Wooldridge is the best choice for the job.

"During the process of looking at potential candidates, it became evident that Jim Wooldridge was the perfect fit to take over as Kansas State's next head coach," Urlick said in the release. "Independent recommendations by two of the most respected men in the basketball world played a large part in Jim coming to Manhattan. He has the reputation as an outstanding recruiter and has a history of being a turnaround artist at his previous coaching stops."

New president, vice president elected by 16-percent margin

By ANGELA KISTNER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jake Worcester was on campus by 8 a.m. Monday and had voted by 8:15.

Worcester, senior in agricultural economics and student body presidential candidate, said he had so much to do Monday there was hardly any time to fit in voting.

"I wanted to make sure I didn't forget," he said. "I tripled checked it to make sure I checked the right box."

Dana Pracht, Worcester's running mate and junior in life science and psychology, had to divide her nerves between a test at 6 p.m. Monday, an hour before the scheduled announcement, and the election results.

When Pracht finally arrived at the Alpha Delta Pi house, where her and Worcester's supporters were waiting for the announcement, the nerves built up even more.

At a little after 7 p.m., when KSDB-FM 91.9 still hadn't announced the results, even Worcester's parents were getting anxious.

"Are they sure they have the right station?" Dan Worcester, Jake's dad, said. "That would be terrible if we missed the announcement."

But Worcester and Pracht didn't miss the announcement. As soon as the words 1,000 came out of Student Senate Election Chair Travis Morgan's mouth, the crowd of about 75 supporters along with Worcester and Pracht erupted into cheers.

"Thank you, thank you, thank you," Worcester said. "We did it."

Worcester and Pracht defeated presidential and vice presidential candidates Jesse McCurry and Kylo Heller, receiving 1,078, 58 percent of the votes cast, to 785, 42 percent of the votes cast.

"This is the biggest win in a few years," Worcester said. "I didn't hear the margin, but it had to have been about 300 votes."

Worcester thanked his supporters. "We had some good leadership and issues," he said. "But it was up to all of you to get the word out."

Pracht said she was ready for whatever came their way.

"I'm ready to start learning, working with students and meeting the challenges of the issues we set out to accomplish," she said.

Worcester and Pracht's issues included improving advising, improving technology and getting a student activity center.

Worcester said he and Pracht are going to have to get down to business starting the first day of their term.

"We've got pretty big plans, so we're going to start working on them right away," he said.

Worcester and Pracht said they felt the campaigning this year was competitive.

"People felt more pressed to bring out their issues and say that theirs was better," she said. "With that came more of an increase in competition."

Worcester said he and Pracht thought they came in with a pretty big advantage from the beginning, but there was a lot of competition, and the others did what they could to catch up.

"There were a lot of good issues, and it kind of got a little negative and a little bitter," he said. "We felt like we ran a positive campaign."

"We put our issues out there to let the students decide, and they did tonight."

Worcester said he and Pracht are going to address some of the issues that came up during the campaigning when in office.

Worcester and Pracht's campaign manager, Travis Lenkner, said he felt their chances of winning were good from the start.

"It was a matter of getting the facts out to students and not letting them get swept up by the negative message and politics others were trying to spread," he said. "The numbers show that we did that."

Lenkner said voter turnout was incredible, which he said he thought was due in large part to online voting but also because students believed in what Worcester and Pracht were about.

"They believed in our message, and that's what gets people out to vote in the end," he said. "If there's not a candidate you want to vote for, online voting doesn't make a difference."

Sue Worcester, Jake's mom, said becoming student body president has been a dream of Jake's.

"Ever since he came to K-State, from the first day," she said.

Worcester said he was ready to take on the challenge.

"I'm very excited," he said. "I'm ecstatic at the opportunity Dana and I are going to have."

Senate to vote on user fee for Lafene

By TANNER EHMKE
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate will vote Thursday on whether Lafene Health Center will be funded by allocation of student privilege fees alone or with an $8 office-visit fee. The fee would be charged every time a student visits the facilities to see a physician.

The goal of the proposed bill that would impose the per-visit fee is for Lafene to reach a 10-percent budget reserve each year of its three-year budget cycle, Lafene Director Lannie Zweimiller said. The reserve is needed for unexpected expenditures throughout the year, such as replacing broken equipment, he said.

"This fiscal year was down to a 2-percent reserve," Zweimiller said. "There was a substantial reserve in the past, but we were operating against that, which diminished that down to 2 percent."

If there is no increase of funds, the consequence would be the cutting of services, Zweimiller said. There would be no reserve money to keep services available, which would be a detriment to students. The need for an increase in funds resulted from a 4-percent inflationary cost and increasing health-care costs, he said.

"The costs have been rising nationwide," Zweimiller said. "While the inflation has been running at about 4 percent, we've been able to operate at costs of only 2 percent. We still have not been able to keep up, even at that rate. The revenue is what has not been keeping up."

Ryan Walker, sophomore in family finances and planning and Senate privilege fee chair, said the proposed budget would prevent Lafene from making up a deficit. In the current budget form, a surplus is accrued in the first year, which is supposed to be held over into the second and third years, Walker said. The proposed bill gets Lafene where it needs to be each year, with help from the $8 fee per student, per visit.

A similar bill was voted down in Senate before the previous budget cycle in 1997, with a proposed fee of $5.

"The fee is the best way to go," Walker said. "Each student incurs a lot of costs at Lafene. So, the user should pay part of that cost, instead of leaving it to the whole student body."

Midwest drought. That warm, dry winter has a dark side. A drought has developed across the southern United States and much of the Midwest, and it's likely to get worse in many areas before it goes away, the government said Monday.

It's going to take a large, large amount of precipitation to end the drought and "we don't see anything on the horizon to bring that in," said Jack Kelly, director of the National Weather Service, which released its first-ever drought forecast.

A drought occurs somewhere in the country every year, typically costing about $6 billion in damage to crops and businesses. But this is the first year the government has attempted to forecast where and how droughts will develop. Scientists say more sophisticated data collection is making that possible.

This year's drought could seriously affect farmers, water resource managers, navigation interests and the tourism industry. Forewarned is forearmed, said D. James Baker, the top official at the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, which oversees the weather service.

Scientists attribute the dry weather to La Niña, the weather pattern that is related to cooler than normal temperatures in the eastern and central Pacific Ocean. La Niña is expected to linger for several months at least.

The forecast said the drought is likely to intensify from Arizona to the Carolinas this spring and possibly could get worse in a section of the Midwest that stretches from northwest Ohio to eastern Nebraska. That region isn't as dry as the South, so a few significant rains could alleviate the problem, officials said.

Louisiana, Mississippi and Alabama experienced their driest February in 106 years. In Georgia, the drought dates back to May 1998.

As of last week, Baton Rouge, La., had received 3.4 inches of rain since the beginning of the year, well below the normal level of more than 11 inches.

East of the Mississippi River, streams are at record low levels, according to the U.S. Geological Survey. Nearly all the streams within the Ohio, Tennessee and lower Mississippi River basins and along the Gulf and south Atlantic coasts are flowing below normal.

"Think of it as not having enough money in the bank. We have not had enough water during our normally wet winter to put in our groundwater bank for our normally dry summer and fall," said Charles Groat, director of the Geological Survey.

On the positive side, officials said the dry conditions mean there is little likelihood of spring flooding.

Bob Jones University policy becoming campaign issue

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Bob Jones University controversy that dominated much of the Republican presidential primary campaign is bubbling over into congressional races.

Democrats, eager to regain control of Congress, are trying to tie Republicans to the fundamentalist Christian school in Greenville, S.C., that, until earlier this month, had anti-Catholic statements on its Web site and forbade interracial dating.

In the Senate, Democrats pushed a resolution condemning the school, while in the House, the party's fund-raising arm distributed a memorandum on Bob Jones' policies and urged candidates to use it to attack Republicans.

"Your Republican opponent may be asked about his/her reaction to (Republican presidential candidate George W.) Bush's handling of the Bob Jones visit," reads a memo from the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "Consider issuing a press release, holding a news conference or writing a letter to the editor to highlight your feelings on the national Republican Party's alliance with right-wing extremist groups."

Bob Jones long has been a customary stop for Republicans on the stump in South Carolina. Ronald Reagan, Dan Quayle and Bob Dole spoke there, and President Bush met with the school's president to discuss gay rights.

Still, George W. Bush's speech there last month drew sharp criticism from Democrats and some in his own party, including primary rival John McCain because he failed to condemn the university's ban on interracial dating and its anti-Catholic views during his visit. Rep. Peter T. King, R-N.Y., switched his allegiance from the Texas governor to McCain because of it.

Bush eventually apologized for having spoken without "disassociating myself from anti-Catholic sentiments and racial prejudice."

Democratic pollster Mark Gersh said there is a substantial concentration of Catholic voters in about one-third of the swing districts around the country and Democrats believe the Bob Jones issue will hurt Republicans there.

"When your national candidate is engaged in something like this, it has an impact on the rest of the ticket," Gersh said.

Scott Reed, who managed Dole's 1996 GOP presidential campaign, agreed the issue presents a problem for Republicans. "The Catholic vote is a crucial swing vote in Midwest industrial cities in Ohio, Michigan, Pennsylvania," he said.

Reed said he does not think the damage to Republicans is long-term.

"It's just taken us off our game for a couple of weeks," said Reed, who is not working on a campaign this year. "There are lots of Democrats out there chortling."

State Legislature considers education-funding options

TOPEKA — It's the perennial battle of local control vs. state responsibility in education.

The House Education Committee had a hearing Monday on a bill that would allow a few of the 304 school districts to raise local property taxes to fund education.

The measure would apply only to districts whose enrollment had declined in three of the past four years and that have reached the limit of their local option budget funds.

The Kansas Association of School Boards and the Kansas National Education Association opposed the measure, saying it now only would apply to three districts — Shawnee Mission, Turner and Hays.

The committee took no action on the bill. Supporters admitted it would be only a patch on a system that needs more work but said it would help.

Sponsoring Rep. Tim Carmody said the flexibility is necessary for some districts, such as Shawnee Mission schools, because their numbers fall, but services must be maintained.

"This adds an option districts currently do not have," Carmody, R-Overland Park, said.

Districts would not have to put the issue up for a vote, said co-sponsor Rep. Phill Kline, R-Shawnee, unless enough people signed a protest petition.

Hays Superintendent Fred Kaufman also spoke against the legislation, saying the school finance formula needs to be changed, but this is not the answer.

"This is the wrong solution because it increases the inequities already present in the formula," he said.

Junction City teen-ager sentenced

By JOSS BRIGGS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Geary County district court judge pronounced Monday a 55-month prison sentence to the second of two Junction City teen-agers convicted of voluntary manslaughter in the November death of an infant.

Jeffery Moretti, 18, apologized for his involvement in Garrett Michael Lytle's death and said he was ready to account for his actions. Judge David Platt told Moretti to surrender to the secretary of corrections by 5 p.m.

Moretti's father silently sat with his hand over his mouth and tears in his eyes throughout the proceeding.

Moretti and Jessica Lytle both entered a plea agreement waiving juvenile status for one count of voluntary manslaughter and a 55-month prison term.

Geary County Attorney Chris Biggs said he thought the sentence was appropriate.

"I believe it was a fair and equitable sentence considering the evidence," Biggs said. "The age of these offenders and all the factors that had to be considered in what occurred here and not the least of which is the fact that we had a defenseless child that was killed. There has to be accountability."

As a 17-year-old, Jeffery Moretti and his 16-year-old girlfriend Jessica Lytle didn't feel they had any other options when she gave birth in late November, Biggs said.

"Nevertheless, there were other options here that were not exercised," Biggs said. "There was a conscience decision to take action regardless of the fact that there may have been a birth without medical attention, and there may have been panic that set in."

Lytle gave birth in Moretti's basement. The baby was placed in a trash bag where it died, and the bag was taken to a local creek, where a rock was placed on top to prevent it from floating, Biggs alleged.

"Mr. Moretti was present for the birth," Biggs said. "The allegation was that he presented the bag for the purpose of putting the child in the bag. There was a discussion after the child was born about the fact that they did not want the child and didn't want to be confronted with that situation."

The child was believed to be deceased by the time they took it down to the creek.

"Moretti allegedly put the child into the creek and placed a rock on the child," Biggs said.

Geary County police found the baby in Lyons Creek several days later.

"Information was received through other kids they had heard conversation that this had taken place," Biggs said. "The two defendants were interviewed, and both of them were extremely cooperative about what occurred in this particular case."

There were small differences in the teen-ager's versions of events in terms of facts, which could have been important in determining the issue of specific intent, Biggs said.

"It was my belief that it would have been difficult to prove premeditation under these circumstances," Biggs said.

Lytle began her 55-month term March 1.

Palden Gyatso, a 64-year-old Tibetan monk, met and spoke with K-State students Monday evening at a presentation sponsored by Amnesty International. Gyatso spent 33 years in Chinese jails, where he was tortured.

Tibetan monk shares stories of torture suffered over 33 years in Chinese prisons

By STEPHANIE J. BONNELL
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Palden Gyatso, a 64-year-old Tibetan monk, has served more years behind bars than any other surviving Tibetan who has reached the West.

Gyatso, interpreted by Namka Tenzin, discussed Monday night in Seaton Hall how he was brutally tortured and imprisoned by China for 33 years, from 1959 to 1992. The speech was sponsored by Amnesty International.

Kajsa Stromberg, senior in biology, coordinated the event.

"My freshman year, I was handed a story of Palden Gyatso," Stromberg said. "Until then, I had no idea that this kind of thing happened. I had no idea that human beings could treat each other in this manner."

Gyatso said he was happy to be at K-State and to be able to express the position of Tibetans.

In 1950, the Chinese invaded, and by 1959, they had colonized Tibet, Gyatso said.

During a demonstration on March 10, 1959, telling the Chinese to go back to their own land, Gyatso was imprisoned with thousands of others and was sentenced on June 6, 1959, to seven years at the Panam District Prison in southern Tibet.

"In the prison, I was made to do hard labor nine hours a day under tough conditions," Gyatso said. "We prisoners were yoked to plows like ox to till prison land. When we were too weak to pull the plow, sometimes carrying two to three Chinamen, we were whipped and kicked from behind."

The prisons had no mattresses or bathrooms. The prisoners were served only one cup of soup each day.

Many prisoners died of starvation, Gyatso said.

"I was lucky for wearing leather shoes. I would boil leather bits to eat with the soup and shared it with other prisoners," he said.

Prisoners survived on boiling mice, insects, dead animals, worms and different kinds of grasses.

In 1962, Gyatso escaped from Panam District Prison with six other political prisoners. When they were two hours away from the Indo-Tibetan border, they were captured by the Chinese military.

Gyatso was sentenced to an additional eight-year prison term and wore iron shackles on both hands and feet day and night for six months.

After the completion of his term, in 1975, he was sent to the Nyethang labor camp, 15 miles west of Lhasa, the capital of Tibet.

Political prisoners in Tibet were treated worse than criminal prisoners who murdered and stole, Gyatso said.

"In 1979, I sneaked out of the labor camp to Lhasa, where I put up a number of posters calling for Tibetan independence," Gyatso said.

He was sentenced to a nine-year prison term on April 1984. His trial lasted one hour, and Gyatso was provided no legal representation or opportunity for defense. He was moved to Outdu Prison.

Gyatso displayed many torture devices used on the prisoners. He showed electronic shocking devices, shackles and handcuffs.

Tenzin said he is delighted to be Gyatso's interpreter because he can help deliver the truth of the conditions people and prisoners face in Tibet under Chinese rule.

"The ultimate thing is happiness of others or happiness of yourself," Gyatso said.

Students admitted under new admissions policy

By NANCY FOSTER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State made history last week by becoming the first university in the state of Kansas to admit students under the new qualified admissions policy, adopted by the Kansas Legislature in 1996.

"We are the first university ready for 2001," Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said.

An event Friday welcomed the first 13 students admitted under this policy. Bosco welcomed the students to K-State and presented them with admission letters.

The policy, which affects current juniors in high school and below, states that in order to attend a state school of higher education, students must meet one of the following three criteria: an ACT score of 21, a 2.0 grade point average based on the Board of Regents' core curriculum or placement in the upper one-third of their graduating class.

Prior to the change in the admissions statute, Kansas students merely had to graduate from a Kansas high school to go to a Kansas university," Bosco said.

Kansas was the last state in the United States to maintain an open admissions policy. In 1996, the Legislature gave all high schools and institutions of higher education five years to complete the transformation process.

Larry Moeder, director of admissions, said they typically begin admitting students in early April but admitted students a little earlier this year because of the new policy.

"We wanted to get a jump on this," he said. "It's new. It's history in the making."

He said the policy would not affect the quality of the university.

"The quality already exists," Moeder said. "I think the goal was to make students better prepared to compete in a college setting."

Bosco said current K-State students are doing well without having had the qualified admissions policy.

"Our average ACT score is 24," he said. "Our students come fairly well prepared."

Moeder said so far they have received different responses from high school counselors regarding the change for their students.

"One of the things we are hearing is that now there are so many curriculums they are working toward, that it is hard for them to advise," Moeder said.

He said a lot of students are trying to fulfill the high school's curriculum, the regents' curriculum and other curriculums required for scholarships and awards.

"We are seeing in our discussion with high school counselors that more and more students are taking a college preparatory curriculum in high school," he said.

He said many are opting to meet this criteria for fear they might not make the GPA or ACT score.

"We advise students to prepare for all three," he said.

Bosco said some anxious students and parents might not apply because of the new policy, but enrollment numbers wouldn't be greatly affected.

"We may have some bumps in the road over the years, but we are working as hard as possible to make it run smoothly," Bosco said.

Registrar's office should finish DARS, live up to word

The registrar's office needs to back up its promises.

The Degree Audit Reporting System — meant to facilitate advising standards on campus, aiding K-State students as they check their progress toward graduation — was officially opened last week after months of being under construction.

The opening, however, was a limited blessing.

Although DARS coordinator Susan

Woodward said DARS is working for a majority of students, many students remain unable to take advantage of the new system. For them, the announcement of DARS availability only was cause for false hope.

These students — many of them curious about the new system and unhappy with the lackluster advising they might have received in the past — only were set up for more disappointment by the false alarm.

The Office of the Registrar's action should now do all it can do to redeem itself. DARS is a good idea, but it is useless to some students in its current state.

Academic advising at K-State — in many colleges — is shabby. Students might be better off on their own than having a once-per-semester meeting at which an adviser nods his or her head distantly as students ramble about the classes they are supposed to take.

Some of these advisers simply do not care. They do not know what the rules are that will allow students to graduate, and they don't want to take the time to find out.

DARS is a wonderful solution to that problem. Students will not have to rely on an unpredictable adviser. They'll be able to rely on something they can count on — a computer.

Before they can count on it, though, they must have a reason to.

The best way to earn trust is not to claim to be available, then prove that claim to be false.

The registrar needs to make DARS available to all students — soon.

If students are to trust an online adviser, that adviser needs to redeem himself or herself.

David Levin, keep up the good work. This paper needs a counter to Scott Roney and Jeff Elliott.

Memo to Max: the Bulls suck.

How come The Star knows everything before Urlick tells us anything?

I would just like to wish everyone a happy spring break and a safe one.

I was wondering if anyone else found it pathetic since our basketball team didn't even win as many games as our football team.

With their proven ability to deceive, lie and hedge issues, I think Max and Tom would make excellent candidates for political office of some sort.

Why are we replacing a basketball coach who won 49 percent of his games at K-State with a coach who won 46 percent of his games at his last head coaching job?

Hey, Max Urlick. Don't forget to take the knife out of Rolando's back.

I like how the student body supports his resignation, even though most of us have never been to a basketball game to support the team.

Bill Snyder, what was your reason for turning down the two-game series with USC?

I agree that Kelly Furnas is a complete moron. "Mission to Mars" is one of the worst movies I have ever seen and definitely ranks as an avoid-at-all-costs movie.

Did I miss something? Since when is Kelly Furnas a girl?

My roommate didn't even know who Asbury was until he resigned.

I'm getting real sick of the people who do the country reviews. If they don't know about country music, they shouldn't be writing about it.

I want to punch Scott Roney in the head.

I demand that every ash tray be removed from every entranceway.

Way to go, Max Urlick. Hire a friend from Iowa. Congratulations to the new coach, old buddy.

I think my roommate is the first person in history to get fired by the Derb.

Jason Heinrich: I'm single. Give me a call.

I think I am the first person in history to get fired by the Derb.

tales from the fish bowl

Siamese fighting fish expresses opinions on movie awards, various topics

Hey everyone, spring break is upon us, so I thought I'd lighten things up a little.

My roommate has been reading the Campus Fourum lately, and being the jealous type that he is, he wants some press of his own.

So, I've decided to let him take over my column for this week.

His name is Jerimetrius A. Fushnickens. He is a betta, also known as a Siamese fighting fish. You can call him Jerry.

It's important that you have a little background information on bettas so you can understand where Jerry is coming from.

Bettas have to live by themselves. If you put a betta in a tank with other fish, it will kill them. If you put two bettas together, well, you just wasted $9.

Jerry lives in a large fish bowl. It's a mansion compared to the cramped, one-bedroom apartment I rescued him from at the pet store. He's a happy fish, but he'll get ugly if he needs to.

Jerry is a movie freak. Although he never has seen a movie, the television in my living room usually is loud enough for him to listen to whatever is playing. During the past few months, Jerry has grown fond of several flicks, and with the Academy Awards coming up, he has made his own awards list of movies and other random things.

Due to environmental circumstances, Jerry couldn't make it to the Collegian, so we collaborated on this one. If we disagreed on anything, Jerry of course, had the final say.

■ The Best Movie of All Time "Terminator 2: Judgment Day" — Jerry and I agree on this one.

The special effects, plot and action sequences make this film stand above the rest. Forget "Titanic." This movie was the peak of James Cameron's directing career.

■ Best Comedy of All Time "Friday" — I personally think "Billy Madison" is the best comedy ever, but Jerry insists that it's "Friday." After hearing some of the quotes he's picked up from this movie, I'm starting to wonder if I need to screen what he hears. I think "Friday" is starting to make him lazy, too. Sometimes I catch him pretending to be sitting on his front porch, getting high. I have to remind him it's fish food I'm dropping into his bowl, not weed. Jerry hasn't seen (or heard) "Next Friday" yet. I just can't bring myself to tell him that it got bad reviews, and Chris Tucker isn't in it.

■ Best Guy Movie of All Time "Swingers" — Jerry and I agree this one is money. He's always saying "Vegas baby, Vegas!" to try to get me to take him there or something. I swear, Las Vegas is the last place I need to go.

■ 1999 Best Picture "The Green Mile" — Judging from the two Academy Award nominees I've seen in this category, my vote goes to "The Sixth Sense." Jerry, on the only hand, hasn't seen any of them, but when I told him about Mr. Jingles in "The Green Mile," he made his decision. I don't know why he liked the part about the mouse so much, but I'm not going to argue with him.

■ 1999 Best Sound "The Matrix" — We own two copies of this movie at my house, so Jerry has heard it several times, and he really likes it.

■ 1999 Best Sound Effects Editing "The Matrix" — I'm not really sure what sound effects editing is, but Jerry says "The Matrix" has the best. I'll take his word for it.

■ Best Album of All Time Dave Matthews Band —

"Crash" — Jerry likes to groove to Dave. His favorite song is "Two Step," which is understandable because it also is my favorite song and it gets played a lot in my room. While "Crash" is one of my favorite albums as well, Everclear's "Sparkle and Fade" gets my vote.

■ Best Album of 1999 Tie: Phish's "Hampton Comes Alive" and Metallica's "S&M" — I am not fond of Phish, and no one I know owns the album, so I don't know where Jerry heard it. Nonetheless, this Phish album gets his vote for album of the year — go figure. Jerry also listens to Metallica whenever my roommate plays it.

He goes nuts when he hears "Enter Sandman" backed by the orchestra. Jerry swears he'll play nice if I give him another fish with which to mosh, but he doesn't fool me. My vote goes to The Orange County Supertones' "Chase The Sun."

I hope everyone enjoyed our guest columnist for this week. Jerry wanted me to point out that he checks his e-mail periodically, so feel free to write him.

He also wanted me to say that if anyone disagrees with him, forget the Fourum — either write him, or if you're feeling lucky and want a shot at the title, the two of you can sort things out in his fish bowl.

U.S. needs to accept all cultures, even tolerate boy bands

Kevin Bacon is nice to look at, and "Footloose" is a movie that epitomizes Hollywood in the 1980s, but after all, it was the '80s.

So why, in the year 2000, is the storyline for the movie "Footloose" still a part of actual life?

Four students attending the Sunnybrook Christian Academy in San Antonio, Texas, recently were suspended for a day from their classes.

Why? The humor in this hopefully is not as apparent as I am victim of allowing, but this is absurd.

They attended a Backstreet Boys concert that turned into more than two hours of the boy band hopping around in costumes their clothing assistants could not have been sober when they picked out (It also must be noted that the Backstreet Boys have been quoted as saying they pray before every performance, and one member of the band wishes to record Christian music in the future).

The mother of one of the students has since withdrawn her son from the academy, and yet another student has been suspended for attending a Ricky Martin concert.

Apparently, the Sunnybrook Christian Academy has a policy that prohibits inappropriate music or dancing.

I do not get it.

How much more ridiculous is society going to be in regard to raising children?

Let us censor our children more, so they never are cultured or socially inept or adept in order to live a life anywhere else on this earth or even here.

Let us leave them feeling incapable of watching a channel available on local cable networks that might from time to time present programs in which subtitles or foreign symbols are a part of the communication.

Let us lead them immediately to becoming the remote commando and change the channel for the sake of becoming involved in a situation in which they are forced to look inside a broad view of the world.

Let us keep them from becoming tainted by culture, books, television and boy bands because I am sure the problems are going to stop, as well as the Colombian drug cartels are being stopped at bringing cocaine into this country. Let us get real.

The J. D. Salingers and Mark Twains of the world are not going away. Why is that so difficult to accept?

Now, I am not talking about a revolution here.

I am talking about some realistic change that does not incur censorship and hiding the culture of America and the rest of the world from children.

Of course, we must deal with children like Dylan Klebol, who was making pipe bombs in his garage and one day went to school and, with the help of a friend, caused the largest massacre within a school in history.

Columbine is just going to become a statistic eventually, and that is sad. In today's society, problems like these are capable of occurring anywhere. It will not go away.

Yet parents who my father must deal with are irritated at him for wanting to administer an armed officer within a high school.

That type of closed-mindedness will get one nowhere but in an office dealing with a situation that might result in great tragedy.

How is sheltering children from the world going to do anything but help their minds remain narrow which in turn will cause more future problems to be ignored?

Stop trying to make these issues go away, and deal with it.

Stop condemning those who are attempting to bring this country's society to a new and cultured level.

Stop banning situations and events and censoring intelligent literature and music that is capable of expanding the mind.

So what if the Backstreet Boys are at the height of the same entertainment world in which Jim Morrison once exposed himself to an entire crowd (we all were born naked)?

To take away any form of education, even for a day, simply for enjoying two hours of pop culture is extremely backward and frightening to one who is as liberal as I.

But one must remember that, even though it might be frightening to think that a person with liberal views is a part of my generation, we are attempting to make our mark with these thoughts and actions.

Exposure to the world can be done in limiting means and every parent or guardian rightfully chooses the extremes to which that exposure is allowed.

Online SGA voting needs to accommodate systems

Editor,

Last week, I sat down in front of my computer at home to vote online through KATS.

I was pleased to find out this year I could vote from the privacy of my home. I thought it would be very convenient.

However, after I logged on to KATS, followed the various links to vote and came to the point where I would cast my ballot I received an error.

That error was that my operating system was not supported. I was upset to find out that, because I do not have a Macintosh or use Windows 9x, I am not allowed to vote. This does not sound like a convenient way to vote for me because now I must go to campus, find a computer with the correct version of Netscape Communicator or Internet Explorer and then vote.

I hope that, in future elections, the Student Governing Association will pick a third party to be host to the elections that allows everyone a chance to vote, not just those who conform and use what everyone else uses.

Elliott's reasoning flawed in evaluating David Levin

Editor,

I rarely write the Collegian.

I think most of what appears in the Collegian is and should be for students and by students.

However, I must take exception to an egregiously fallacious set of remarks that appeared in Jeff Elliott's column Tuesday.

Detecting and avoiding mistakes and misplays of reasoning occupies a central place in my profession, both as a philosopher and as an educator. Seeing a misplay of reasoning so striking as that committed by Elliott is not something I reasonably can demur from noting in a public forum.

The passage in question concerns Elliott's assessment of a piece by another columnist, David Levin. Levin's positive view is that there is an appropriate, objective, non-theological standard for determining why some acts are immoral and why some are more immoral than others.

But Elliott's subsequent restatement of, and rejoinder to, that view seriously is flawed.

He wrote: "If a harmonious social environment is the only thing for which we are living, then we are a pathetic, wretched species."

Elliott offers no argument for this claim. On its face, the claim is pretty amazing. I cannot be the only one who paused to note that it has been pretty hard for us to attain anything like a harmonious social environment — in places like Bosnia, Chechnya, South Africa, Alabama or Watts, for a few obvious recent instances — in which people have fully flourishing lives. Against that background, one reasonably might think aspiring to meet a standard of harmonious and productive social arrangements is not pathetic or wretched at all.

Instead of arguing his point, however, Elliott proceeds, "If truth is relative and there is no God or afterlife, what's the point of life if it is all over after we die?"

I only will note the obvious fact there is no argument here but only what I suppose Elliott — mistakenly — takes to be a rhetorical question. What I want to point out and dwell on briefly is that Elliott asserts by implication that Levin's view is committed to resting on relativistic foundations.

Well, of course, Levin's standard is not predicated on relativistic foundations. Quite to the contrary, he had argued there is an objective (non-relativistic) moral standard by which reasonably to test our moral beliefs.

One can disagree with the standard Levin proposes. I do not, myself, agree with it. But characterizing it as resting on the very opposite foundation of that to which the standard actually is committed is not an appropriate way to disagree with that or any other proposed standard.

It is to engage in an intellectually shabby set of argumentative practices unworthy of a university student.

Opinion page should move beyond topic of religion

Editor,

I am writing in response to what seems to be a yearlong series on religion and God.

When will the insanity, finger-pointing and closed-mindedness stop?

Starting this past fall, a number of valid articles have been published by Brandi Hertig, Scott Roney, David Levin and Jeff Elliott. Have they all been strong-winded? Yes.

Have they been well-written? Yes. Has any of them gotten any closer to the actual truth of the matter? No.

We have reached the saturation point. Some of us side with Levin and Hertig. Others with Roney and Elliott. But does it matter? More than likely, the truth probably lies somewhere in the middle. It seems to me, however, we have been told countless times (mostly by the Christian right) that the middle just isn't acceptable. So, here's how I see it.

There are 20,000 students on this campus. There are also probably 20,000 different opinions on the issues of God and religion. While I completely agree the Opinion page is reserved for columnists' opinions and reader feedback, I think it is time we move on. I, like other Collegian readers, would like to see some fresh opinions on some new topics.

From now on, let's just leave religion where it belongs — to ourselves.

Christians' loyalty stems from attacks on beliefs

Editor,

Though somewhat confused by the meandering column by David

Levin, I came to the conclusion he believes Christians in general are a bunch of brainwashed, closed-minded individuals who won't listen to any scientific proof.

While each profession has its share of mad scientists, I believe Christians in general are open-minded and are constantly searching for deeper understanding. Levin points out the tendency of Christians to stick by a "Christian Conception," even after they are proved false.

I deduce the reason many Christians do this is they are afraid their faith will be attacked by non-Christians. I, and other Christians, hold the principle belief that God is the creator of the universe.

Now, with the Big Bang theory being the most accepted theory on the origin of our existence, I take a step back and say "Wow, that is how God did it."

If one was to make a cake, he wouldn't just say abracadabra, and a cake would appear. He would take the appropriate measures, by mixing the ingredients together and baking it. In that same way, I believe God had a recipe for our existence. Did the eggs just happen to jump in the bowl along with the flour and the rest of the ingredients? No, the baker is the creator of the cake, no matter what recipe he follows. As for Levin's notion of Christians being closed minded, Christians' search for deeper meaning in their faith proves that invalid.

As for Christians' weariness to change their Christian conceptions, people in any other belief or profession would be just as weary if they were going to be met by someone saying, "Your whole belief system is wrong. I told you so."

Roney's label of Newton as Christian misleading

Editor,

In his column Monday, Scott Roney asserts that Isaac Newton had "Christian convictions," i.e. Newton is quoted by Roney attesting to the domination of the universe by an intelligent and powerful Being.

The only problem is that by any standard definition, it would be stretching it to say Newton was a Christian. Indeed, the Lucasian Professor of Mathematics at Cambridge University (the academic position Newton held) was granted a special dispensation from having to profess belief in the 39 Articles of the Church of England. That is, Newton probably could not in good conscience say he believed in the Trinity, the divinity of Jesus and other usual tenets of Christianity.

The evidence is Newton most likely was a kind of Deist, believing in a "watchmaker" God who started the universe but did not "interfere," i.e. did not give us special revelations, create miracles and the like.

Standard biographies in Hale Library, such as that by the noted scholar Richard Westfall, tell the whole story.

Evolutionism, creationism cannot be compromised

Editor,

Surely David Levin did not mean his comment in Thursday's Collegian that "Christian fundamentalists reject the reality God created and instead create one of their own."

If he did, his statement implies

God might have created reality, and he should be warned of the consequences of such an idea.

First, let me dismiss the notion that the theories of evolution and creation can coexist. Evolutionists believe life arose from non-living matter and has evolved mindlessly through a mechanism of variation and natural selection. Creationists believe God created life and fashioned it according to intelligent design.

Clearly, at least one of these theories is false.

Furthermore, any compromise between them will require a significant shift in the philosophical foundations of each theory.

If God did create reality, then science must deal with the unmeasurable and untestable variable of supernatural power that doubtlessly will wreak havoc on every aspect of materialistic evolution. Ironically, evolutionists have built their theory on an equally unmeasurable and untestable assumption that a collection of chemicals somehow came together to form a living organism. Though they weren't there to see it and have been unable to duplicate it, evolutionists must cling to this assumption because of the lack of a better explanation. With God in the picture, they must abandon the assumption altogether.

In light of this consequence, I am inclined to believe Levin's comment was actually a condescending remark aimed to deflect reasonable criticisms of a scientific theory on the verge of collapse. Evolutionists must understand that creationists will not continue to be satisfied by scraps from the table of those who consider themselves to be the scientific elite.

We must seek truth. And truth is something that cannot be compromised.

Topics abound in turbulent sports world

VIEWPOINT

Chris McLemore

Do two-time former Student Governing Association candidates Rick Wooten and Aaron Shea have terrible timing, or what?

Last year, Wooten and Shea ran for president and vice president with one goal in mind: to fire Tom Asbury.

The problem: Asbury and company were putting the finishing touches on a 20-win season that included the annual "close call" at Phog Allen Fieldhouse and a blue-collar defense that ground opposing teams a halt.

The result was a candidacy that got fewer votes than the winner. ...

This year Wooten and Shea were at it again. One pillar of their platform was oddly familiar: fire Tom Asbury.

The problem: Asbury and Co. had just put the finishing touches on the worst record in the Big 12 conference and a replacement had already been lined up. I guess timing is everything.

I'm sure we all noticed the Campus Fourum caller who claimed that Bill Snyder's recent decision not to play the University of Southern California Trojans makes K-State look like wimps.

My guess: Snyder coupled divine intervention and an intense understanding of football to make a decision that isn't wildly popular but will be in the best interest of a young Wildcat football team. Then again, I don't shape popular perception, and it is that perception that determines television viewership, national attention and ultimately, nationwide respect.

Maybe there's something to be said for a non-conference road game here and there. And don't tell me that the opening game against the hapless Iowa Hawkeyes at Arrowhead Stadium in Kansas City is an "away game."

Was anyone else as proud as I was to realize that each member of this year's men's basketball senior class made it through their entire career without beating the daylight out of another member of society?

Was anyone else proud that forward Tony Kitt became such a liked player despite his brief two-year stay?

And speaking of Kitt, those Big 12 lovelies trying to pad their statistics with hopes of NBA glory can rest assured that there will be a whole lot more rebounds to go around with Kitt's departure.

I find myself staying away from Seth Childs Cinema because my columnist salary doesn't exactly make my cup runneth over, but can somebody please tell me why a K-State women's home tennis match can attract a smaller crowd than the Alan Keyes campaign? Free entertainment is going sorely underused.

Speaking of sorely underused, the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics has put in some fine new bleachers for the K-State men's baseball team that continue to sit empty.

Has the phrase "March Madness" ever been a more literal term? The Cincinnati Bearcats were the nation's No. 1 team until the nation's No. 1 player broke his leg in a Conference USA tournament game. The Bearcats had two losses that day, the second coming at the hands of the "mediocre at best" St. Louis Billikens.

After Cincinnati's loss came Arizona's upset of highly-ranked Stanford. Those Arizona Wildcats must have been tickled pink to know they were the only team in America to have beaten Stanford and K-State in the same year.

I'm all for supporting the Big 12 Conference, but I just can't pick sides in the Missouri-North Carolina first-round match-up in the NCAA tournament. It's one of those games where neither team shows up so the tournament committee decides to send a team like Florida A&M to the second round as a replacement.

Whether the Tigers or Tar Heels come out on top is of little importance considering their second-round opponent will be No. 1 seed Stanford, who will barely break a sweat in their first-round laughter against South Carolina State.

Speaking of unwinable second-round games, those dandy Kansas Jayhawks have to fend off a feisty DePaul team to get the chance to play the Duke Blue Devils. Roy's Boys don't exactly have a cake-walk to the Sweet 16. But then again, that's just the way K-State fans like it.

Women finish 7th in track nationals

By NICK BRATKOVIC
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A pair of second-place finishes helped the K-State women's track and field program to finish seventh at the national meet.

Freshman Amy Mortimer placed second in the 3,000 meters with a career best time of 9:16.59, finishing three seconds behind Villanova's Carrie Tollefson, who ran a 9:13.68.

Mortimer's previous time for this event was 9:22.18.

In the pole vault, Erin Anderson finished second with a mark of 13 feet, 5 1/4 inches. She finished behind champion Tracy O'Hara of UCLA, who vaulted 14 feet, 6 inches on her way to the NCAA championship.

In the mile run, Korene Hinds finished ninth with a time of 4:53.82. After day one of competition the Cats were in fourth place.

The next day, the women's distance medley relay team of Hinds, Rachel Woods, Amanda Crouse and Mortimer placed third with a season-best competition of 11:12.45.

In the weight throw, senior Anna Whitham placed sixth with a 62-foot-10-inch mark in the last meet of her collegiate career.

The seventh-place finish is an improvement over 1999, when the Cats tied for 32nd place with six points.

After a weekend of championship competition, the Cats begin their outdoor competition at both the Emporia Spring Twilight and the College Station Heptathlon/Decathlon on Thursday and Friday.

Rowing team begins season

By DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State women's rowing team opened its 2000 sprint season in dominating fashion Sunday, blowing Creighton out of the water with a 20-1 victory at the Tuttle Creek Reservoir in Manhattan.

K-State led early after a first- and second-place sweep in the varsity eight competition over the lone Creighton entry.

The Wildcats' first varsity eight boat posted a time of 6:45, the fastest of the day, while the team's second boat tallied a 6:57.9 in the 1,800 meter race. The performance notched eight points to K-State's score for the meet.

"Overall, I think this was a good outing for the team," varsity head coach Jenny Hale said. "I think the team stayed on track in regards to what we have been emphasizing, and the boat speed today contributed to that.

"I saw good rowing out there today. We now need to keep on track — the competition only gets tougher from here."

Meanwhile, in the first varsity four race Sunday morning, the women produced a time of 7:33.8 to win the event by nearly 35 seconds and earn three more team points.

The second varsity four followed by tacking on three points, as the squad's time of 7:42.2 brought victory.

K-State also saw success in the novice competition, with the first novice eight boat claiming five points after posting a time of 7:34.6. The first novice four team added another tally with a 31-second victory over the Blue Jay's opposition.

"It was a very good start to our season," novice head coach Kevin Harris said. "I liked how our athletes stayed in the moment on the water."

The Cats' lone loss came at third novice four, falling to the Creighton boat by nearly one minute. However, it was the squad's first race and only its eighth time on the water.

"These kids have had very limited time on the water since joining the team in January," Hale said. "For them to row an 1,800-meter race after practicing only seven times on the water is amazing. I am extremely proud of them."

K-State will travel to Austin, Texas, on Sunday for the Heart of Texas Regatta.

"We have four days of practice, and then we head to Texas," Hale said after the Creighton meet. "The competition on Sunday will be an early season challenge for us."

REAL COMPETITION

Smaller schools offer stiff competition against Cats

K-State's baseball game against Doane at 2 p.m. today at Frank Myers Field isn't just another automatic win for the Wildcats.

For that matter, future K-State games against Bethany and William Woods, or against smaller Division I teams such as Niagara and Howard, aren't guaranteed victories on the Cats' 54-game schedule.

K-State (5-12 overall, 1-7 Big 12) needs only to look at Oklahoma to realize that it isn't invulnerable to the smaller schools. The Sooners dropped two games to NAIA-Oklahoma City earlier this year.

Head coach Mike Clark has experienced these kinds of games from each side, as a pitcher at NCAA Division II Missouri Western and now as a head coach of a Division I school.

"I have wins, when I was at Missouri Western, against Missouri, Kansas State, Kansas and Iowa State," Clark said.

In Clark's tenure at K-State, the Wildcats have lost four games to non-Division I opponents: a 5-3 loss to Missouri Western in 1988; a 13-8 decision to Emporia State in 1991; a 16-14 loss to Regis in 1996; and a 10-9 decision to Fort Hays State in 1998.

"There's any number of things that can happen. It's a rarity when it happens, but it does happen, and it happens to everybody," Clark said.

He credits those losses to the uniqueness of baseball.

"The pitcher is 75 to 80 percent of the game," Clark said. "In baseball, that guy on the bump can be crafty and have the day of his life and change everything around."

"The worst team in the Major Leagues still wins 65 to 70 games. That's the way baseball is. You just don't line 'em up and blow 'em off the line of scrimmage — you can't do that," Clark said.

Games against non-Division I opponents are a tool Clark uses to prepare his team for conference games, something normal practices cannot accomplish.

"It's hard to get into game speed with practice — hitting is such a fine line with the timing," Clark said. "Most scientists will tell you it's the toughest thing in athletics to do. In order to do that, you have to see pitching, and you have to see game-speed pitching day after day after day to keep your timing. We can't simulate it in batting practice."

The matchups can improve the team from the mound as well.

"It's an opportunity for our young kids to throw without the pressure of a conference game on their shoulders," Clark said.

"Hopefully, they can go out and get quality innings and pickup things that they can use next weekend and the weekend after that in conference games," he said.

Tennis team's 1st Big 12 win halts losing streak losing skid.

No. 58 K-State (6-4, 1-0) used a doubles sweep to stymie the Red Raiders (2-9, 1-4) on their home-court.

The Wildcats were led by the tandem of freshman Petra Sedlmajerova and junior Eva Novotna, which K-State head coach Steve Bietau moved to No. 1 doubles for the first time this year.

The duo responded by downing Texas Tech's Amanda Earhart and Ayako Suzuki, 9-8 (7-3), to ignite the sweep and extend their doubles winning streak to six.

Junior Anna Pampoulova and sophomore Alena Jecminkova followed with a decisive 8-1 victory at No. 2 doubles, while sophomore Kathy Chuda and junior Natalia Farmer added an 8-4 win over their Tech opponents.

However, Bietau was modest in regard to the conference victory over the Red Raiders, saying his team didn't play to its full potential.

"I'm happy to get a win, but I definitely feel like we didn't play our best match," Bietau said. "The level of performance is not what we're capable of."

In singles action, No. 51 Sedlmajerova kept her perfect record alive with a 6-3, 6-0, win over Earhart at No. 1 singles, escalating her 2000 mark to 10-0.

The freshman has dropped only two singles sets during her spring campaign.

Pampoulova, however, fell at No. 2 singles, 6-2, 6-7, 6-4, to Suzuki. The loss was only the junior's second defeat in 10 matches this spring.

Meanwhile, Novotna and Chuda both notched victories, marking their sixth singles win in their past seven attempts.

Jecminkova also won her match at No. 3, 6-2, 6-2, over Sonnia Orellana, but Farmer dropped No. 6 to Texas Tech's Noel Ruiz, 6-3, 6-2.

K-State's victory over the Red Raiders extended its spring win total to six, surpassing the number of Wildcat wins in all of the 1999 season.

Up next, K-State will be host to Big 12 foe Missouri, at 2:30 p.m. Wednesday in Ahearn Field House.

Move to Fiedler Hall affects more than civil engineering

By JENNY RYAN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The construction of Fiedler Hall has not simply affected engineering students and faculty. It has been the catalyst to several upcoming moves around campus.

The Department of Civil Engineering plans to move to Fiedler this summer. Once that move is complete, the Department of Geography will move from Dickens Hall to Seaton Hall in Fall 2000.

Replacing the vacancies left by geography, the Department of Philosophy will move from Kedzie Hall to Dickens Hall in spring 2000. The A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications will fill the space left by philosophy.

"This is a series of moves all related to civil engineering moving into the Durland/Fiedler complex," said Helen Cooper, assistant director of Facilities Planning.

"We will also be doing some remodeling in between the moves, such as painting, taking out a wall — nothing significant — but trying to tailor the existing facilities to the new department," she said.

John Harrington, head of the Department of Geography, said the move from Dickens to Seaton will be disruptive at first but will provide the department more space than is currently available.

"The move will provide us a little more space than we have now, and we will be very aware of the extra square footage," Harrington said. "We have tried to partition the new space, which provides about 1,000 more square feet."

"We tried to provide our education activities, rather than our research activities, with more of the new space," he said. "We know this move is going to be disruptive because it's going to take time away from other activities, but we feel it's a good location on campus and will provide us with some more room."

James Hamilton, head of the Department of Philosophy, said the move from Kedzie to Dickens should be positive.

"The move will help us in a number of ways," Hamilton said. "We will gain more single office spaces for our faculty members. Right now, we have many faculty sharing office space."

Hamilton said one potential drawback is that the department will be divided among different floors in Dickens.

"Here we are all on the same floor. There we will be divided. It is really important to us that we maintain the feel of the department. We've been working closely with the assistant dean and statistics to help with that problem," he said.

The space in Kedzie left by philosophy will help journalism and mass communications faculty by providing more office space, director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications Todd Simon, said.

"Generally, the whole campus is short on space. Philosophy moving will give us more space for people. Right now, we have three faculty members without permanent offices. The space left by philosophy is mainly going to be all small office space, which is what we need," Simon said.

Simon said the long-range goal for the school would be to move all outlying journalism programs into Kedzie, like the Journalism Education Association in Fairchild Hall.

"Right now, it's so well hidden not many people know about it," he said. "But, the real interest right now is moving people with offices in McCain over here. There are four faculty and two graduate students with offices in McCain. We would like to open that space up for music, which is the most space-patched department on campus."

"Certainly we have hopes for what we want to do with the space, but it's so far off we haven't really thought hard about it. Nothing pushes you like a deadline."

Families welcome soldiers home

By CHRISTIE VANOVER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nearly 100 Fort Riley soldiers were welcomed home early Monday morning after a six-month peace-keeping mission in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

"I don't think there's a better way to start off a week or to start off a day than by welcoming American soldiers back from mission overseas," Maj. Gen. Freddy McFarren, commanding general at Fort Riley, said.

"The American people should be impressed with what our soldiers are doing over there," McFarren said.

As "God Bless the USA" played across the speakers, tears filled the eyes of family members, and pride filled the faces of fellow soldiers.

For one family, the ceremony was more than a homecoming. It was an introduction. Sgt. Jason Porter, Company C, was introduced to his 3 1/2 month-old son Michael for the first time.

This is Porter's second son. His 4-year-old son, Matthew, was also at the ceremony hopping around in his seat looking at every soldier who walked by hoping it was his daddy.

Matthew said he can't wait to play with his dad as soon as he gets back. Danetta Porter last talked to her husband Friday, and said he's just as excited.

"He's so anxious to play with Matthew and to hold Michael for the first time," she said prior to his arrival.

As Jason was released from formation, his wife and boys presented him with yellow roses.

"I thought it would be nice for him to get something from his boys," Danetta said.

Among the crowd there were also many pregnant women. Sgt. Roger Memmer, Company C, found out his wife was pregnant the day he left last August.

"I was really concerned that I wasn't going to be there for her, but duty called," he said.

Memmer said he received 553 e-mails from his wife throughout his rotation, and after discovering she was having a boy, they chose a name for him.

"I know while these soldiers have been gone problems don't go away, and that families have to deal with certain things, and we appreciate all that they have done," McFarren said. "You will always be proud of the fact that you participated in a noble cause."

Marino delivers emotional farewell

By STEVEN WINE
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

DAVIE, Fla. — The men at the front of the room wore dark suits and somber expressions, like at a funeral. The wife sat in the front row crying. Dan Marino bit his lip, took deep breaths and leaned on the lectern.

"This isn't easy," he said.

But as always, Marino followed the game plan. With both relief and reluctance, he retired Monday at age 38, confirming a decision he made Thursday.

Marino managed to keep his composure, but his strained relations with the Miami Dolphins made the news conference an awkward occasion. Because of the perception that the Dolphins pushed Marino into retirement, the mood was subdued.

"This is an odd day because it saddens everyone, when it should have been a celebration of this guy's career," former Dolphins president Tim Robbie said.

Absent was former coach Jimmy Johnson, whose feud with Marino turned last season into a soap opera. New coach Dave Wannstedt attended but didn't speak.

Marino read an eight-minute statement, then patiently answered questions for more than an hour — a personal record for the most prolific passer in NFL history.

"Boy, I really struggled with this decision," he said. "This has been the toughest month of my life."

Marino rejected an offer last week to play for the Minnesota Vikings, and said he decided to quit mostly because of the toll 17 NFL seasons took on his body, not because of the way the Dolphins treated him.

Health QUESTION

By: Art Rathbun counselor and biofeedback specialist for University Counseling Services

Q: How does stress affect your memory?

A: The emotional and physiological stimulation associated with stress can have a significant effect on memory. This is of particular concern when stress comes as a result of a traumatic event or events.

Most students will, however, experience the effects of stress on memory as a result of stressors not associated with traumatic events. Tests are good examples of these non-traumatic events. The more we make such events traumatic, the greater the effect on memory.

Inability to recall the answer to a question or the correct steps in a process during a test are related to the perceived stress level of the test. Remaining calm during a test and reminding yourself that the test is not the most important thing in life can help, but all of us from time to time will underperform because of the effects of stress on memory.

MAGNETIC ATTRACTION

OF ALTERNATIVE THERAPY DRAWS IN BELIEVERS

BY JENNIFER LAKE

Magnets are becoming an attractive option for alternative medicine.

The recent trend leading away from traditional pharmaceutical methods has forced the acknowledgement of such possibilities as magnetic therapy.

Despite the lack of concrete proof of the credulity of magnets for health use, many people think it will take time for the concept to be fully tested and accepted.

Andy Knoll, operator and owner of Shape Escape Health Club in Osborne, Kan., offers a full line of natural supplements, including magnets in various forms. Knoll and his wife, Sharon, offer items ranging from body magnets to bed systems. A popular product is the flexible brace, which can be used on different parts of the body. Andy Knoll said although the use of magnets still is refuted by much of the scientific community, a person would have to try it out for themselves, because like any medicine, it depends on the person.

"I'm not going to say that magnets are a cure," he said. "I will say that I have seen many, many people eased from some of their pain when they use them."

Knoll said the magnets help promote blood circulation and can ease pain or fatigue. He said a variety of people, including everyone from secretaries to professional athletes, use magnets.

Jerry Becker, Manhattan resident, started using a magnet brace on his knee after testing it out.

"I stand a lot at work, and one day I wore the brace on one knee and not the other. By the end of the day, the braced knee felt much better than the one without the brace," Becker said. "I know that could be because I wore a brace, and not because it had a magnet in it, but I've worn braces before and this just felt much different. I don't care if they say they don't work. I think they do, and that's all that matters."

Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotion at Lafene Health Center, said the lack of significant evidence must be considered when making a decision on the use of magnets for healing purposes.

"The studies that have been done show there is no considerable difference between those who used the magnets versus those who had the placebo," Kennedy said. "The use of magnets is becoming a multi-million dollar business, and I'm afraid people are promised something they just won't get."

Knoll said it is important to use a reputable company.

"Many people are being ripped off by companies that are giving them magnets that are worthless," he said. "The company I work with has been in this business for 10 years, and continues to uphold high standards for their products. We want our clients to trust us. We make sure they try it out and see what's best for them."

Both Andy Knoll and Kennedy emphasized the importance of seeing a doctor first for injuries or other health problems.

"It's important people make sure to not assume magnets will be a 'quick fix' for them," Kennedy said. "If you are in pain, you must see a doctor."

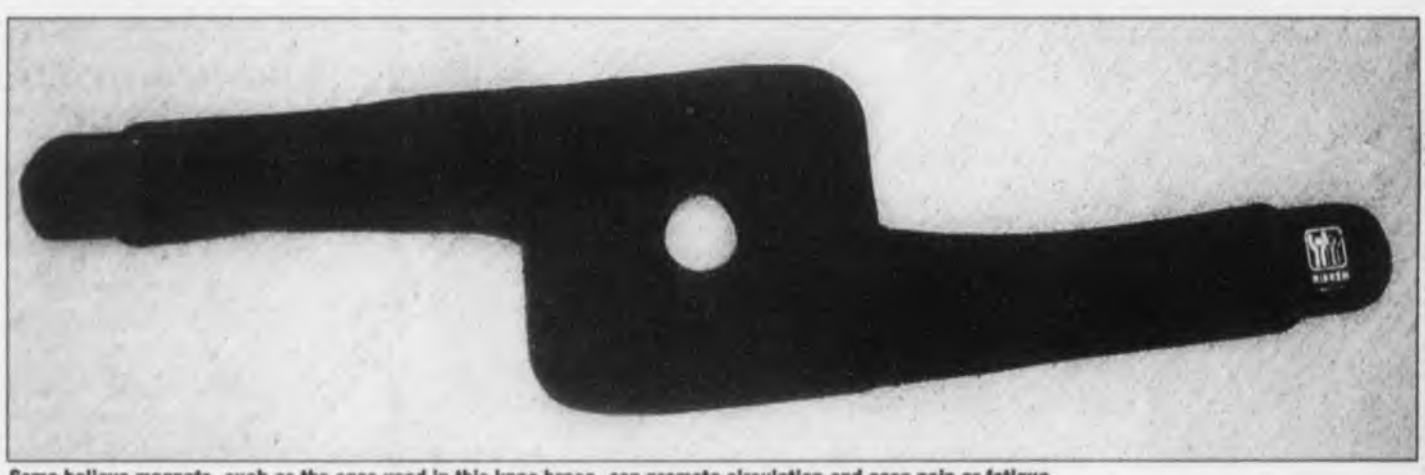

Kennedy said the Food and Drug Administration has not yet approved magnetic therapy. So far, the only therapy being used is electromagnetic pulse therapy, used for broken bones. Kennedy cautions the use of magnets, which might interfere with other healing methods.

"Using alternative therapies can interfere with medicinal prescriptions or methods such as pacemakers, insulin pumps and medicinal patches like the Nicoderm patch," Kennedy said. "It is vital for a person's safety to talk to their doctor before they try a new health method. People are encouraged to try new things, so long as they are smart and safe about it."

"I'm not going to say that magnets are a cure. I will say that I have seen many, many people eased from some of their pain when they use them."

Andy Knoll owner of Shape Escape Health Club in Osborne, Kan.

Some believe magnets, such as the ones used in this knee brace, can promote circulation and ease pain or fatigue.

Programs teach students to deal with issues

By SHANNON DELMEZ
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

University Counseling Services offers help to students in the form of workshops and therapy groups, which can take on many different topics.

Each workshop runs for an hour and a half, and there usually are four to eight sessions per workshop over the course of a semester.

Dorothy Farrand, coordinator of the UCS workshops and groups, said some of the groups deal with issues such as relationships, grief, shyness, assertiveness and body image, as well as rape survivors and couples.

"There are two components in most of these groups or workshops," she said. "One is to learn more about yourself, and the other is to learn specific skills that allow you to handle things more effectively. Usually, we do that by doing structured activities, and then the group members will interact with each other and learn from each other."

Farrand said the groups provide a number of things for the participants. They provide a safe place for sharing concerns, support in dealing with concerns, feedback from others and a place to learn new behaviors and practice new skills.

"They provide an awareness that you are in the same boat as other people, that you are not alone," Farrand said. "Others struggle with the same things that you do. They provide a way to learn from the experiences of others."

Michael Maples, UCS counselor, leads two groups, one dealing with relationships and the other with shyness.

"The content of each session is determined by the people who are in the group," he said. "So, whatever they want to talk about, they can bring. The way we start a group is by doing a check-in with everyone to describe how their week's been going."

During the check-in, group members mention subjects they would like to talk about.

"It is really a peer-led session where there is a mixture of support for one another, advice, and also just feedback," Maples said.

Elisabeth Sundermeier, UCS counselor, said workshops are structured differently from the groups.

"Generally, in workshops there are less requirements to divulge a lot of personal information," she said. "They are more of a kind of educational teaching and real safe kind of discussions. Support groups are a little bit deeper, and that would be more members who share a specific issue coming and talking about their struggles with whatever that issue is."

Each group or workshop focuses on a specific issue. Sundermeier is involved with some groups for women, including one that focuses on body image.

"It's about the messages that women get from society about thinness and that being connected to their value," she said.

"Then, we have another one called 'Surviving and Thriving after Sexual Assault,' mostly made up of women who were date-raped at one point in their life or actually stranger-raped as well. Its a support group for them."

Sundermeier also said one of the biggest concerns of the counselors is getting people to the groups. She said many people feel threatened because they are not sure who they will see at a workshop or group.

"Sometimes we have less of a turnout than we would hope, but that's something that we wish somehow we could let people realize that it's safer. I hope that we can get people to come to these more, because people get a little nervous about, 'Who might I see there?' or 'What happens in these groups?'" Sundermeier said.

"Workshops are pretty much a venue for you to learn about yourself and you don't have to do a whole lot of self-disclosure. I think knowing that, people would feel less threatened."

Farrand said the groups are successful and provide a comfortable way for participants to overcome their issues.

"What's important for students to know is if they join a group, that groups work even for those people who don't necessarily want to speak out, but want to be part of a group and listen to others," she said. "In any group, each person can control what they say, how much they say and when they want to say it."

Committee modifies abortion bill

By CARL MANNING
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — The abortion debate shifted directions Monday when a Senate committee rewrote a House-passed bill to get it closer to something that Gov. Bill Graves is willing to sign.

The Federal and State Affairs committee voted 5-3 to send the Senate a bill that abolishes what state law calls "partial-birth" abortion and broadens the exceptions for other late-term procedures.

A key ingredient in the issue is the word "health," which anti-abortion lawmakers want to restrict to physical health.

"It does include mental health," he opposed to that," Sen. Laurie Hecker, R-Great Bend, said. "The nub of the debate is what is health as an exception."

Sen. John Vratil, who offered the change, said health has been defined for years by the U.S. Supreme Court as physical and mental health. Graves says both exceptions must be included to make the bill constitutional.

"It will clear up the controversy over what health means, and as I use it, it must be in the broadest sense to include mental health," Vratil, R-Overland Park, said.

Vratil said he drafted his change to coincide with what Graves wants because "we are wasting time passing legislation that the governor won't sign."

Graves' legal counsel, Natalie Haag, said the committee's proposal is something the governor likely can accept.

"As long as it bans partial-birth abortion and contains the health exception he wants, the governor can support the bill," Haag told reporters.

The committee changes didn't sit well with Rep. Tony Powell, who handled the House version of the bill.

"It is totally unacceptable. The bill means abortion on demand, and it will not stop a single abortion," said Powell, R-Wichita.

Senate President Dick Bond said his chamber will debate the bill Wednesday or Thursday.

"It doesn't help the process to have abortion lingering on the calendar very long because it's so divisive," Bond, R-Overland Park, said.

Some anti-abortion members on the committee objected to rewriting the House bill to deal with late-term abortions.

"I thought we were going to stick to partial-birth abortion," Sen. Nancey Harrington, R-Goddard, said.

Nebraska head basketball coach fired

By DOUG ALDEN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LINCOLN, Neb. — Danny Nee was fired as Nebraska's head basketball coach Monday after his team's worst finish in 10 years.

Nee's termination will be effective March 31, and a national search for a new coach will begin immediately, NU athletics director Bill Byrne said. He said the university will be forced to pay Nee about $400,000 to buy out the three years remaining in his contract.

"The best course for the University of Nebraska is to change coaches," Byrne said at a news conference announcing the move.

The announcement came 16 days after Nee became Nebraska's winningest coach by one win with a 254-189 record in 14 seasons, the longest career of any active Big 12 Conference basketball coach.

The Huskers, who failed to win a single conference game on the road this season, lost to Baylor in the first round of the Big 12 tournament Thursday. Nebraska finished with an 11-19 record, its worst under Nee since the 1989-90 Huskers went 10-18 and last failed to earn a bid to either the NIT or NCAA Tournament.

After the Baylor loss, Nee declared on his final postgame radio show: "It's over."

Byrne said he had several possible candidates for the job in mind, but he refused to name them. He said he would not approach them until their seasons end.

Nee did not immediately return a message seeking comment left at his office Monday.

Byrne said Nebraska's poor season was not the lone reason for his dismissal.

"It's just not one season or one incident. It's an accumulation of things," said Byrne, who would not get into the specifics of what led to his decision.

Nee, 54, was often targeted in local radio call-in shows and newspaper columns. He said throughout the season that he was not going to quit. A resignation would have cut him out of the hefty contract buyout.

Nee and Nebraska have been an odd fit over the years. The sharp-tongued Brooklyn native has at times clashed with the conservative atmosphere of the midwestern state, where football sits atop the sports scene from August through January.

chair of the Privilege Fee Committee, said the $8 office charge was based on a proposal from Lafene. The facility would not generate enough revenue below $8. However, if Lafene charged above that limit per visit, students wouldn't want to use the services.

The Student Health Advisory Committee voted unanimously against the office fee and was in favor of Lafene being funded by student privilege fees.

"It's a battle of philosophies and principles," said Jason Lantz, junior in pre-medicine and chairman of the Student Health Advisory Committee. "This committee has opposed the $8 student office charge since the beginning."

"I don't see the positives to warrant an office fee charge," Lantz said. "Many students wouldn't be able to afford it, especially those with chronic problems."

There were not a lot of hard facts supporting the office-fee charge, Lantz said. In the future, it eventually will be implemented, but at this

LAFENE FACTS

■ The projected costs for Lafene Health Center are anticipated to increase from $4,433,300 in 2001 to $5,079,641 in 2005.
■ In fiscal years 1998, 1999 and 2000 Lafene received 65 percent of its funding through student privilege fees, or $2,607,659 per year.
■ Now, 30.61 percent of privilege fees go to student health.

If the $8 office fee per visit is passed, Lafene would receive that money, as well as the following proposed amounts.

Fiscal year	Amount
2001	$2,817,762
2002	$2,900,045
2003	$3,017,756

point in time, it not a concern, he said.

The cost should be shared by all students because Lafene affects all of the of the campus indirectly, said Mary Bosco, Senate vice-chair and member of the Privilege Fee Committee. Because of the interaction of students, all students are affected and should contribute.

Bosco said more students would be more willing to go when the services already have been paid for. The office fee would punish the people who use the facility extensively, when it is not their fault they got sick. Fewer students would seek help because of the accessibility of the facility to those who are sick, she said.

Conrad said $8 is still affordable.

With a doctor, the cost is directly attributed to a student's visit, as opposed to a student benefiting from the cost of air-conditioning the K-State Student Union. Therefore, a student must pay a little bit more for usage, he said.

Even though Lafene has always been funded through privilege fees and the service fees, it is not wrong to re-evaluate the way things are being done, he said. The Student Health Advisory Committee is adhering to the past, Conrad said.

Bosco said she disagrees. "It's not a matter of dollars. Everyone should contribute and share the burden," Bosco, junior in public relations, said. "That's the whole idea of a public university and the privilege fee."

McCURRY

McCurry predicted earlier in the evening that voter turnout would be a deciding factor in the race.

"If everybody who supports us voted, then we will win," he said. "If not, it will be close."

Both candidates also said they thought if the time between the general election and the runoff had been longer, the ticket would have been able to garner even more support.

"I think it would have helped if we would have had another three days," Heller said. "You can't ask for everything. The election process is set up to be efficient."

Robin Cates, McCurry and Heller's campaign manager, said she was disappointed in the apathy she saw among students.

"I don't know how many students told me they weren't going to vote because they didn't think it mattered," Cates said.

Between debates and one-to-one campaigning in front of the K-State Student Union, the candidates and their supporters said they had gotten little sleep.

"I'd have to say that we are disappointed," McCurry said. "We had a lot of fun. We couldn't have asked for better help."

Heller stood fast and said he thought the candidates had stressed the issues students wanted to hear. "I wouldn't have switched issues," he said. "We had the right issues."

Heller and McCurry were considered outsiders to student government. Although both had served in other campus leadership positions, Heller had never served in student government, and McCurry had been elected to one term to Student Senate his freshman year.

"It makes me sad that students voted for the status quo," Cates said.

Both candidates said they hoped Worcester and Pracht would continue to emphasize communication with students during their term.

"They are good leaders," McCurry said. "Government needs to listen to the concerns of students, and I think Jake and Dana can do that."

The candidates continued to oppose a proposed student activity center as not being a replacement with one-to-one communication with students.

"I hope they keep in mind that communicating with students means communicating with the student body and not just student groups," Heller said. "People need to be involved in the process."

Chicago Bulls head coach Tim Floyd and former K-State head coach and current Los Angeles Lakers assistant coach Fred "Tex" Winter both gave Wooldridge solid recommendations for the position.

"Jim Wooldridge is an honest, talented and good person," Floyd said. "Every job he has taken on has been an incredibly difficult challenge, and at every stop the team has exceeded expectations, and the institution has benefited. Kansas State is lucky to have him. Jim Wooldridge can really coach, and the players will love him."

Winter perfected the triangle offense while at K-State in the 1950s and 1960s, but it wasn't until he joined the Bulls in the 1990s when he had the opportunity to utilize the offense using Michael Jordan en route to six NBA World Championships.

Wooldridge, who has been with the Bulls since 1998, worked with Winter last season when Winter was still on the Bulls' coaching staff before joining the Lakers this season.

"I worked with Jim last year with the Chicago Bulls, and I was what you may consider his mentor," Winter said. "I was really amazed and impressed with Jim and his grasp of the game of basketball. His experience with the triangle or triple-post offense was one reason he was hired by the Bulls. I think he'll fit in beautifully at Kansas State. He's a wonderful choice, and I can't think of anyone that I know who would be a better fit at K-State. I'm happy for both Jim and Kansas State."

Wooldridge comes to K-State with head coaching experience at three different schools. His last stint as a head coach didn't go so well when he led his alma mater Louisiana Tech, which were coming off NCAA probation the season prior, to a 52-59 record in four seasons. Before Tech, Wooldridge was at the helm of Southwest Texas from 1991 to '94 where he was 47-40. Wooldridge's most success was at Central Missouri, where he compiled a 131-48 record from 1985-91.

Bulls captain Randy Brown said it's going to be hard for Wooldridge to leave Chicago.

"He's good for these young guys and good for us as a team, period," Brown said. "He does a lot of little things. He's very upbeat and loves his job. It's going to be tough losing him, especially with what we're trying to do. Coaches like that are hard to come by."

K-State's Web site to get design upgrade

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A K-State committee wants to provide students with more information at the click of a button.

Beth Unger, vice provost for academic services and technology, said the World Wide Web is changing rapidly, as well as its ability to accomplish certain tasks. She said with this new development, K-State's Web page also must move with the current trends, which means an update.

"The way the Web is moving, we can put in much cleaner pages with more possibilities of giving the most information," Unger said. "Our page is two years old, and we are trying to incorporate a lot more information that is available with just one click of a button."

William Richter, chairman of the university's Web site design committee and associate provost for international programs, said the university's home page has won national awards in the past, so the redesign is a mandate to try to improve it further. He said the committee already has received many ideas from both the committee itself and outside sources, but he said more are welcome from faculty and students.

"We want to make the page more functional and user friendly," Richter said. "We also want to identify which audiences the page takes into consideration, and what ways we can strengthen it toward other audiences."

Richter said the committee has a May 1 deadline to have a draft of the redesigned

Web page ready. He said shortly after that, users of the K-State Web page will be able to see visual changes as well as functional changes.

Richter said student input is needed because they are the ones who access the page the most for research information and are the most diverse population on campus.

"The students on campus are representative of the university community," Richter said. "With something like a Web page, there are different uses for each individual person, and each person will see the page differently. This is why it is necessary to get input from every type of user, so we can have a better product."

Richter said the page is useful now to internal users such as students and faculty, but for those who are not at the university information about K-State and what it has to offer.

"This technology is open to many types of uses," Richter said. "We need input from such as prospective students, accessing certain sites and information might be difficult.

Richter said it is important to seek suggestions from everyone because any information can help in improving the home page for prospective students, businesses, sports fans and whoever needs to obtain as many people as possible to ensure that the resources on the page are as relevant as possible."

Unger also said student input is crucial because they are the ones who use the page to search for student services and other information related to the university. She also said students can have the most creative ideas and are on the frontline to be able to answer the problems better.

"We want to focus on what the students need to be able to use the page as a functional source," Unger said. "We are also interested in their perspective as prospective students."

"We want to know how we can change the page to better serve those who want to come here, so they know what K-State has to offer," she said.

Salina introduces greeks to campus

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Once considered just part of the main campus, K-State-Salina is coming into its own — complete with Brotherhood, the first social fraternity in the school's history.

Its purpose is to give a social atmosphere to the men on the Salina campus and to offer the same type of activities and environment as the Manhattan campus, said Mike Higley, president of the fraternity and freshman in computer information systems technology.

"There is a social life that is present at other universities, and we are working toward that at Salina," Higley said. "Student organizations are beginning to build here, and greek life is a part of that."

Andrew Schone, sophomore in computer information technology, said he was approached with the idea of bringing a social fraternity to the Salina campus by Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement and dean of student life, so the campus could have the same kind of social opportunities as Manhattan's campus.

Bosco said that with the growth of the Salina campus and its student-run organizations and living groups, it was a natural process to begin a greek system.

"The Salina campus is becoming more and more a slice of what we represent in Manhattan," Bosco said. "It is not surprising that the students would want to have the benefits of being in an organization with the opportunities of student leadership, academic support and social activities."

Schone, who also is an alumnus of the Farmhouse fraternity at K-State, said he only is acting as an adviser to the group, but he said starting a greek system at Salina will make the campus seem more like a university than an extension of the Manhattan campus.

"The Salina campus has nicknames like vo-tech and the little sister to Manhattan," Schone said. "We are trying to bring more of a university feel to campus, and by establishing a greek system, we are one step closer to doing that."

The fraternity is looking at three national fraternities with which to become affiliated — Delta Chi, Phi Delta Theta and Delta Sigma Phi. Schone said the group will ask national representatives from the three fraternities to come speak with them, and then make their decision about which one to single out.

At that time, the national fraternity also has to make the decision to choose the Salina organization to become a colony. Schone said he thinks with the support and enthusiasm K-State-Salina has for forming a fraternity, they have a good chance of being chosen.

"This will give students something else to do during their free time and on weekends," Schone said. "We have the opportunity of bringing a different aspect and a different style of life to the campus."

Schone said many students on the Salina campus are excited about the idea, and recruitment is going well in its initial weeks. He said the group will have chosen a fraternity to affiliate with by the fall semester and has hopes of participating in greek activities on the K-State campus, such as Homecoming and the Pledge Games.

"We hope to use the fraternity to unite the bond between K-State-Salina and the Manhattan campus," Schone said. "The fraternity is a way of giving the same opportunities to students on the Salina campus and creating the feeling of a real university."

Higley said the group of nine men has not been able to sponsor any activities by Bill now under consideration to curb infant abandonment

By CARL MANNING
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOPEKA — Legislation allowing a parent to abandon a newborn baby without getting in trouble with the law is a good idea, but it needs some work before it's ready for Senate debate, its sponsor says.

The bill was considered Tuesday by the Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee. All of the witnesses spoke favorably about the measure, but several offered ideas for what they saw as needed changes.

It also was a chance for adversaries to be together on an issue. Right to Life of Kansas and Planned Parenthood — with opposing views on abortion — agreed the bill is a good thing for protecting abandoned newborns.

"I think the concept has strong support by the committee, but since this is new legislation, we need to pull the best from existing practices in other states," said Chairwoman Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan. "The concept deserves the work."

Under the bill, any newborn up to 45 days old could be dropped off at a hospital, fire station or health department. The child would be turned over to the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services, which would start the legal process of terminating parental rights.

Those dropping off a newborn at the designated sites wouldn't be charged with child abandonment, if the child was turned over unharmed.

"This bill would provide added protections to our most vulnerable residents," said Joyce Allegrucci, assistant SRS secretary for children and family policy.

She suggested the committee rewrite the bill to allow SRS to utilize existing laws. For instance, she said the person taking custody of an abandoned baby can contact local law enforcement rather than SRS.

Law officers already are required to notify local prosecutors who begin the chain of legal events for placement and termination of parental rights, she said.

Last year, SRS took in 13 abandoned children under age 1 and in 1998, six.

Melissa Ness of Kansas Children's Services League said her group supports various education and prevention programs to help parents, but endorsed Oleen's bill, which she called not a solution but rather a response to a crisis.

"One of the main forces behind providing immunity is to eradicate fear and shame so that people will access services rather than harm children," Ness said.

Other suggestions raised during the hearing included lowering the age of eligible newborns to 30 days and giving parents a grace period of around 10 days to change their mind and reclaim the child.

The bill mentions only one parent, but some committee members suggested that both parents agree to give up the child.

Other questions included whether parents dropping off a child should give their names and whether unharmed in the bill could disqualify a newborn harmed by a botched delivery.

Wooldridge officially announced as next men's basketball coach

■ See page 6 for updates and student responses to the new coach.

Let the Jim Wooldridge era of K-State basketball begin.

On Tuesday, he was introduced to the K-State community, and he laid out his plans for the program.

"I had a prepared speech, but I think I want to scratch that and just talk to you," Wooldridge said.

Atop Wooldridge's agenda is restoring pride to the program.

Evan Semoni/COLLEGIAN
K-State Athletics Director Max Urlick announced Tuesday the hiring of Jim Wooldridge as the 20th men's basketball coach in school history. "During the process of looking at potential candidates, it became evident that Jim Wooldridge was the perfect fit to take over as K-State's next head coach," Urlick said.

"My dad once told me a long time ago ... if you don't have pride in what you do, you don't have anything," Wooldridge said. "We are going to restore pride in this program. I can promise that. That is the one thing I can promise. And that comes from people believing in a common goal."

He said pride stems from teamwork, and he will call on the K-State community to help restore pride to the program. It is teamwork that comes from boosters, to faculty, to students, Wooldridge said, and students are critical in the process. He said he wants Bramlage Coliseum to be as loud as possible.

"That is kind of where the enthusiasm starts, and we have got to get to them, and our players need to be involved and how they conduct themselves. Hopefully, they will create an environment that when teams come in here they have got a tough place to play."

Wooldridge also said another key is recruiting. He said an area where he would like to recruit heavily is the Midwest, but he has recruiting connections to other areas as well. He will be recruiting actively, as will his assistants, whom he hopes to hire soon.

"We'll evaluate the current staff as quickly as possible, and I have contacted other coaches from around the country as to the hiring at K-State," Wooldridge said. "It is a process that is not just starting today. I would like to complete it as soon as possible. We are in a critical time as far as recruiting is concerned."

Wooldridge said he began following K-State basketball when he was in sixth grade, and a player named Steve Mitchell from his hometown in Oklahoma drew his attention to the program.

Wooldridge said he has followed the program ever since, and he

Robel focuses on communication with KSU alumni

By JAMIE BARRETT
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State Greek Affairs Adviser Barb Robel will not undergo further scrutiny by K-State alumni, Mike Goodpasture, Interfraternity Council President, said.

Goodpasture said the concerns that were voiced about Robel's work in a Feb. 28 meeting have been dealt with, and it has been realized that the problems did not stem from Robel, but from communication problems.

"We personified the problems we were having in Barb and now have realized that it was the lack of communication," Goodpasture said. "We are now focusing on the communication with the alumni and with our adviser."

IPC and Panhellenic Council will have to wait to respond to the other concerns voiced during the alumni meeting.

A follow-up meeting was scheduled for today but now has been canceled. A separate, open Greek Affairs meeting has been scheduled for April 4.

Goodpasture said the meeting was canceled because the alumni who planned it felt as though the issues that would have been addressed were resolved.

"The meeting would have been unnecessary if held," Goodpasture said.

Charles Hostetter, Sigma Alpha Epsilon house corporation president, said today's meeting had been scheduled to develop a task force between IPC, Panhellenic Council and Robel.

"I am not sure if we will still address that in the April 4th meeting or not," Hostetter said.

Goodpasture said the task force idea still might be used, but its main purpose was to develop better communication,

Florida judge rules school vouchers unconstitutional

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. — A state judge Tuesday ruled that Florida's school voucher law is unconstitutional, throwing out the nation's first statewide program to help children in failing public schools attend private schools.

Fifty-three children attending private schools in Pensacola can finish the school year, Circuit Judge L. Ralph Smith Jr. ruled. But the state can take no other action to implement the law, Smith said.

The program, championed by Gov. Jeb Bush, allows students in Florida's worst public schools to receive vouchers of up to $3,389 a year to pay for a private or parochial-school education at taxpayer expense.

Florida has 2 million public school students, but only children in schools deemed failures by the state are eligible for the voucher program. Only two elementary schools, both in Pensacola, so far have been labeled as failing.

"We won it lock, stock and barrel," said Ron Meyer, one of the lead attorneys challenging vouchers.

Bush was disappointed by the judge's ruling, his spokeswoman, Elizabeth Hirst, said.

Children with disabilities and other special needs already are getting taxpayer help to go to private schools, she said, adding that Bush will continue to fight for Florida schoolchildren and the right of parents to choose the best school for their child.

The decision will be appealed to the 1st District Court of Appeals, but lawyers on both sides of the case said it was likely the appeals court would be asked to pass the case on to the Florida Supreme Court.

Besides arguing that vouchers violate the state constitution by spending public dollars on private schools, opponents argued that vouchers violate the separation of church and state when they are used to attend parochial schools.

Smith's decision, made without considering any evidence, was based solely on the language of the state constitution. Smith concluded the law violated the mandate that the state provide a free education through a system of public schools.

Under the state constitution, he wrote, "Tax dollars may not be used to send the children of this state to private schools."

Challenging the program was a coalition that included a teacher's union, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Florida PTA, the League of Women Voters and a handful of families and educators.

Paper plant tank explodes, killing 2 in South Carolina

ROCK HILL, S.C. — A tank exploded outside a paper plant Tuesday, killing two workers.

The 11:30 a.m. explosion at the Bowater Inc. plant also injured two others, said Gary Loflin, a York County Emergency Management spokesman. They were taken to Piedmont Medical Center for treatment of slight injuries, he said.

The four were welding the tank when turpentine fumes ignited, Loflin said. The tank collects liquid from the pulp-making process.

One of the workers killed was Danny Sherer, 49, of Rock Hill, hospital spokeswoman Carolyn Carpenter said. The identification of the other fatality was withheld pending notification of relatives, authorities said.

About 50 workers were evacuated, initial reports said.

State bill proposes change in board-election process

TOPEKA — Legislators are considering a bill that would change how state board of education members are elected.

The House Education Committee had a hearing on the measure Tuesday but took no action.

The legislation would make the elections non-partisan and change their date from November to April. Elections then would then coincide with local school-board elections.

"We hope it will improve the visibility of education issues at the local and state level," said Mark Tallman, lobbyist for the Kansas Association of School Boards.

But opponents say elections should remain in November, when voter turnout is higher.

The committee plans to vote on the bill later this week.

Speaker discusses personal experiences in abusive marriage

By DANICA COTO
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It wasn't supposed to happen. Her mom was a housewife, her dad a barber and neither of them ever hit Hedda Nussbaum or used drugs or alcohol.

Nussbaum, the baby of the family, grew up shy, trusting and a little chubby, she thought.

"My childhood was so normal, it was boring," she said.

But because of this upbringing, she said, she became ready for meeting someone abusive.

Domestic violence was the topic of the speech she gave Tuesday night in Union Forum Hall. The speech was sponsored by Union Program Council's Issues and Ideas Committee.

Nussbaum first made the news in 1987, when police arrested her and her companion, a lawyer named Joel Steinberg, after finding their 6-year-old adopted daughter comatose. Their daughter, Lisa, had been beaten by Steinberg repeatedly that day.

However, she was not the only one abused.

Steinberg repeatedly abused Nussbaum for 10 years, leaving her with a ruptured spleen, a broken knee, broken ribs, broken teeth, a cauliflower ear and endless scars.

During the time they were together, Nussbaum wasn't allowed to leave the house or eat without his permission, and she sometimes had to sleep in the bathtub or on the floor without a blanket.

"Now, it's just incredible how low I had sunk without realizing it," she said.

"I became a walking zombie, and I was unable to save Lisa on November 2, 1987, when Joel hit her."

After she left the police station that night, she was surprised to see the press outside.

She said she was so brainwashed that she did not understand why all those people were making such a fuss about her hospitalized daughter.

The press, some feminists and others accused Nussbaum of causing Lisa's death.

They asked why she couldn't just walk out.

"With a battered woman, it's not a matter of 'just,'" she said. "Now why didn't I see this? The reason is, abuse is subtle and gradual."

Nussbaum said many women are scared to leave these types of relationships, and people have to understand that the level of abuse gradually grows over a period of several years. By the time this happened, she was severely brainwashed, she said.

She didn't meet Steinberg until she was in her 30s. Prior to that, she had dated throughout college and received several marriage proposals, but none were Mr. Right, she said.

They met in 1975, and she was very attracted to his charismatic ways and vibrant eyes.

"I just fell for him right away," she said.

But after a while, Steinberg began criticizing who she was. He would sit down with her and critique her social skills.

He would act as a therapist and tell her what she should do and what she should say.

Nussbaum was flattered and pleased that she had become more outgoing and had received promotions and raises at work.

"I gave Joel all the credit for all these things that were happening," she said. "He was my savior."

It was three years before

Steinberg hit her. He smacked her with the heel of his hand and seemed sorry, but never said the words, she said.

The next morning, she had a black eye and was worried what people at work would think. She went to the hospital, and after telling the doctor that her boyfriend had hit her, she regretted it. So she had the doctor cross out the reason for her black eye.

"Women tend to think that it will never happen again, but it always does."

— Hedda Nussbaum, survivor of domestic violence

This was Nussbaum's first rejection of reality.

"There is always a next time," she said. "Women tend to think that it will never happen again, but it always does."

There was a honeymoon period in Nussbaum's life after she and Steinberg decided to adopt Lisa. But the abuse started up again, and Nussbaum was fired from her job because she didn't show up, trying to cover her black eyes.

Then the mental abuse escalated. Steinberg convinced Nussbaum that she had done horrible sexual things, and that she didn't remember it because of her amnesia.

He also made her believe that her family was evil and the root of her behavior.

He would make her smoke free-base cocaine with him, make her take ice-cold baths and hit her over the head every night with an exercise bar.

Nussbaum had to leave. She did, five times, but returned every time. She sometimes would call him when she ran away to make sure he wasn't worried about her.

During all these years, Nussbaum never told anyone the truth. She said she didn't know why her family didn't find out or why the police, when they visited her twice, didn't take notice.

Those days are gone for Nussbaum.

Gone are the days of the trial, when she was granted immunity if she testified against Steinberg, and gone are the days of recovery, when she was placed in a psychiatric hospital.

Today, Nussbaum speaks out against violence and is the editor of Women's News, a monthly publication distributed in northern New York.

Janet Bozarth, senior in English and Issues and Ideas Committee chairwoman, said the committee decided to bring Nussbaum to K-State because domestic violence is such a serious issue.

"The Issue and Ideas Committee is really here to make students think," she said. "Sometimes it helps to have a controversial speaker, because we can look at an issue more deeply and from different angles."

Nussbaum said she doesn't have a boyfriend now, but she's not afraid to have one.

"I'm not scared of it, but men are scared of me," she said.

However, Nussbaum is concentrating her efforts on informing people on domestic violence for Lisa.

"I'm sorry. I'm sorry I didn't see," she said. "I'm sorry it's too late to see. But we can help others."

K-State organizations participate in Adopt-a-Highway program

■ Kansas has 10,000 miles of state highways; about one-third adopted.

By CRISTINA JANNEY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Walking along the side of a highway, wearing bright orange reflective vests and picking up trash might not be the most glamorous job on earth.

But K-State organizations do the grimy work as service to their community as a part of the Adopt-a-Highway program.

"It is a good thing to do for the community," said Shaun Ryan, public relations chairman for Sigma Chi fraternity. "You can show you care for the community."

He said there is a certain sense of pride and a job well done after the men clean their stretch of highway.

Seven of the 27 groups who participate in the Adopt-a-Highway program in Riley County are K-State organizations.

"I think it is something we can give back to the university and the community in general," Tad Drescher, president of Kappa Sigma, said.

"There is that sign out there that lets people know that the greek system gives back to the community."

Each group agrees to clean usually about two miles of highway.

The Kansas Department of Transportation oversees the program and provides the trash bags and reflective vests.

"All we ask is their time and effort," Kim Stich, KDOT spokesperson, said.

At least one person from the group must receive safety training from KDOT and then pass that knowledge on to all the members of the group who will be out on the highway.

"It is good to have the highway cleaned, but safety is our number-one priority," Stich said.

The program helps the environment and saves the state money, Stich said.

more info

Riley County's Adopt-a-Highway office is in Wamego, and can be reached at (785) 458-2353.

"Our first priority is to build and maintain highways," she said. "We clean up when time is available."

Adopt-a-Highway means that state employees don't have to be used to clean up the highways.

"It's a win-win situation," Stich said. "It benefits the groups. It benefits the environment, and it saves the state money."

Besides the safety vest and trash bags, the only other cost to the state is signs that bear the organizations' names. Stich said the cost is small in comparison to the savings.

Kansas has 10,000 miles of state and interstate highway, and about a third of that is adopted by about 1,900 groups from across the state that participate.

The program started in Texas in 1985 and quickly spread to other states. This year is the 10th anniversary of the program in Kansas.

Some communities, such as Topeka, have adopt-a-street programs, too, Stich said.

There is no cost for organizations to participate in the Adopt-a-Highway program.

Groups need only to call their local K-Dot office.

Basketball fans should support Wooldridge

Jim Wooldridge, K-State's new men's basketball coach, introduced Tuesday after the resignation of Tom Asbury, needs support in order to avoid suffering the same fate as Asbury.

For starters, it's going to take a while for Wooldridge to build the program he wants, because he will have Asbury's recruits for the next two or three years.

Bear with Wooldridge, and do not tear him down from the start. Let him do his job and support him, even when everything doesn't go as we would like.

In the end, if he receives the support he obviously will need from the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics and fans, K-State's men's basketball program soon could begin winning again.

If K-State's athletic department is serious about making a change for the better, prove it.

When head football coach Bill Snyder came to K-State 11 years ago, he was given support both from the athletic department and fans — which is why K-State was able to build a winning program.

Obviously, by looking at the football program's success in the 1990s, K-State didn't cut any corners.

To have the same success in basketball, there shouldn't be any corners cut there, either.

Sure, the easy part is done. K-State features one of the top basketball arenas in the nation and just opened a new weight room for the women's and men's hoops programs this year.

The hard part, and the aspect Athletic Director Max Urick really should consider, is the behind-the-scenes work: the support staff, alumni and — most importantly — the attention the athletic department needs to pay to the men's basketball program, as much attention as it has paid to the football program the past 10 years.

Forget Wooldridge. Hire Rolando Blackman.

Hey, Asbury, when you leave town, would you take Joe Leonard with you?

Will David Levin ever learn to write like Scott Roney?

Good job, Jesse. At least you had realistic ideas.

It would be a good idea to get a basketball coach with a winning record.

Guns in America, 21st-century style

RE-EXAMINING AMERICA IN THE WAKE OF FIREARM VIOLENCE

Saturday night's all right for fighting, but not as good as Sunday morning — in an election year, no less.

Hopefully, you had better things to do than watch President Clinton and National Rifle Association executive vice president Wayne LaPierre yammer and spout position platforms on ABC's "This Week."

Ken Wells

If you want a definition of how to "talk at someone" as opposed to "talk to someone," this is the show for you.

Clinton's diatribe was taped Friday, so interaction between him and LaPierre was impossible, which is a pity — had either of the participants paused and blurted "Your mom!" at any point, it would have fit in seamlessly. To listen to LaPierre, Clinton wants to take guns away from everyone, including police, leaving law-enforcement authorities with only broom handles to protect and serve. To listen to Clinton, the NRA wants to install gun racks in cribs.

Occasionally, the combatants danced around an issue, but these two speakers specifically are too much in love with their own rhetoric to take a break from the speech and, well, listen. Clinton lambasted the gun-control lobby for opposing mandatory trigger-locks and 72-hour waiting periods on purchasing firearms at gun shows. LaPierre wondered what effect signing more feel-good legislation would have if it was upheld with the Chief Wiggum passion with which the nation's current gun laws are enforced.

I'm troubled. Not just by the inability of the nation's "leaders" to genuinely communicate for all their incessant yammering, not by this "avalanche" of school violence, but because we as a culture are worried now as opposed to 10 years ago.

It's interesting what catches our eyes, or what others deem worthy of our attention. Has there been such an explosion of gun violence in the past few years, or is it just noticeable violence?

Two questions. Is gang violence from urban America so much more acceptable to us than affluent white kids snapping like dry twigs and riddling classrooms with bullets? Is the "Oh my, gasp, I can't believe it could happen here in Happytown, USA, while I ... well, probably could be pressed to believe that it could happen in urban Los Angeles" attitude inherently racist?

According to the Los Angeles Department of Health Services, between 1981-92, every 8 1/2 days, a child in Los Angeles County between the ages of 5 and 9 was shot and killed. A kindergarten Littleton every season. Equally grim news from the National Institute of Justice Research Preview: The homicide rate for 16-year-olds jumped 138 percent between 1985 and 1992.

You think that's terrifying? That's nothing.

considering the fact that I actually consider myself pro-gun. In the polarity of the pedantics, I'm closer to LaPierre than Clinton.

I always will lean toward personal freedom before government intervention because I'm well-acquainted with the bureaucratic ability to screw things up beyond all redemption. I figure if an adult American is capable of handling a firearm responsibly, then a culture that fervently maintains its right to drink and smoke itself into self-annihilation really doesn't have much room to deny those people a weapon.

But we've got us some problems here.

First, check out this lead from an uncredited Associated Press story: "Trying to keep guns from children and teen gang members, President Clinton is ordering licensed gun dealers to post signs and give buyers written warnings against passing off firearms to minors." Wow, if we'd had that kind of powerful, compelling legislation before Littleton, the media would leave that damn town alone, right? The AP story was published June 19, 1997. Sign all the bills and get all the photo ops you want; it doesn't mean jack if you enforce them like liquor laws in a college town.

Also, what the hell is it with the NRA? Is 72 hours too much to ask? Where in LaPierre's mind has he equated "compromise" with "capitulation"? What is so irresponsible about trigger locks, waiting periods, background checks? The NRA is oblivious not only to the violence gouging through the nation but to the urging of its constituency, hoping an extremist stance will bring the middle closer to where it wants it to be.

Instead, the NRA has, in the past 10 years, disintegrated its image, tarnished its reputation and has decided that stonewalling any and all gun-control legislation is acceptable. It's the cavernous delay into which more and more lives fall. If the NRA can't learn the art of compromise and the price being paid with every moment of inactivity, it deserves the fate it's digging for itself.

But most importantly, we've got a younger — and, now, a not-so-young — generation weaned on a Smith & Wesson. These are the kids who know what MP3s and MP-5s are.

They're the not-ready-for-PrimeTimeLive players — kids who shoot, kids who kill, kids who get killed, but just aren't rich or white enough for media coverage. They're forgotten, overlooked, ignored, swept under the rug and rightfully pissed about it.

Are guns a problem? Yeah, but they're not the problem. The problem is there are a bunch of people — some of them awfully young — on the outside looking in. If they couldn't get a gun, they'd come after us with an ice pick. Actions born of desperation can't be legislated against; they're a social problem, not a legal one, and we don't have answers for this one. Not yet.

Too big an issue (or issues) for one short and short-tempered column, I know. I'm just astonished how long I've held firm to the ideal of the "right to bear arms," and just thinking that it finally might be antiquated or at least in need of re-evaluation, well ... it challenges my notions of what this country should be about and how we got to where we are.

But it doesn't bother me as much as the blood — how much blood — that was spilled to get me just to think instead of comfortably thump the party line.

New honor system serves as vanguard among universities

A Feb. 15 Los Angeles Times article by Kenneth R. Weiss says: "Students cheat in high school in part because they think everyone else does."

But students can change their ways if colleges clearly demand honesty, engage students in ethical issues and put them in charge of enforcement, said (Gary) Pavela (director of judicial programs and student ethical conduct at the University of Maryland) and his colleagues at such schools as UC Davis and Kansas State University, which are in the vanguard of a new movement to change the academic culture."

It's nice to be recognized as a vanguard with respect to our Honor System, which has been in existence since the start of fall 1999.

Hearing panels comprise three students and two faculty members who decide the guilt or innocence of the alleged violators of the honor pledge and also determine the appropriate sanction.

Ten cases have come before the Honor Council so far, seven of which will or have proceeded to the hearing panel stage for adjudication.

To review the results or progress of those cases, go to our Web site at www.ksu.edu/honor. Click "KSU Violations of the honor pledge."

Seven students in those 10 cases — involving a total of 16 students — were sanctioned by receiving an "XF" grade for the course that appears on the student's transcript. The "X" indicates failure is due to an act of academic dishonesty. The "X" can be removed only by enrolling in an Academic Integrity Seminar, which will be offered each spring semester. The "F" remains a permanent part of the transcript, although the course may be repeated for an additional grade.

Of the above 10 cases, eight were initiated by faculty and two were initiated by students who alerted faculty to alleged dishonest activity by fellow students.

In those two cases, three student witnesses were willing to appear before a council hearing panel and provide their account of what they observed, doing their part to protect the academic integrity of the university.

In three of the 10 cases, faculty assigned an "XF" grade to the student and informed the student verbally and in writing of their right to appeal through the Honor Council adjudication process.

In two cases, the students accepted the "XF" and did not appeal. In one case, an appeal has been filed and is currently being investigated by one student and one faculty member of the council's.

Although I believe the honor system is functioning well in this its inaugural season, we also continue to evaluate all we do and the way in which we do it.

Each member of the Honor Council sits on one of three committees: Procedures, Training or Communications.

The Procedures Committee has been involved in the design of the Academic Integrity Seminar, designed by Doris Wright, associate professor of counseling and educational psychology, and Helene Marcoux, a Ph.D. candidate in the same area, which is scheduled to begin after spring break. In addition, this committee works on modifying and improving our constitution and bylaws and our hearing panel procedures.

The Training Committee is concerned with the process of keeping current council members informed on how to conduct an investigation into an alleged violation of the honor pledge and how best to train new members.

Because all cases are different, council members learn to approach each new case with a fresh and open mind.

The Communications Committee is concerned with informing the K-State academic community about the workings and importance of the honor system.

In addition to placing the honor system poster in all university classrooms, committee members are willing to appear before any K-State academic or social group interested in hearing more about the honor system.

If your discipline or group is interested in a member of the council appearing, please call the Honor System Office, 532-5344.

Although my impression is that many faculty members believe in and support the honor system and take the time to discuss it in their classes, there seems to be at least some cynicism expressed by both students and faculty.

One student recently wrote me and said: "So far, my peers and teachers, regrettably, do not believe in the system at all. In fact, many of my professors have stated outright that they feel it is just another PR move by the Provost ... Moreover, my friends and classmates have little idea of what the Honor Council is and the ones who do are worried that it will become no more than a means for snitches to get others in trouble. Obviously, more education is needed."

My response simply is that all of us need to do our part to actively learn about and support our young honor system.

Faculty members need to remind students of academic expectations with respect to honesty and integrity. Students need to ask faculty members to clarify expectations when there is uncertainty or confusion.

Department heads and deans need to put issues of academic integrity high on their list of academic concerns.

Students interested in being nominated to serve on the Honor Council need to apply to the student body president, on the ground floor of the K-State Student Union.

Faculty should alert their respective deans of their interest in being nominated to serve on the council. Faculty and student leadership should seek ways to increase professional recognition for service on the Honor Council.

Our honor system, I believe, is off to a good start. All of us now need to do our part to help protect the academic integrity of K-State.

Phil Anderson is the Honor System director and instructor of speech communication. You can e-mail him at phil@ksu.edu.

U.S., U.K. urge private companies to share data from DNA sequencing

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The United States and Britain agreed Tuesday to openly share data from a groundbreaking project to decode the human genetic pattern — a study that could serve as the foundation for developing new medical cures and preventions.

The two countries said they would share raw fundamental data on the human genome, including the human DNA sequence and its variations, with scientists everywhere. A joint statement urged private companies to follow the lead of government laboratories.

Some companies have shared data, while others have not. PE Corp.'s Celera Genomics Corp., a private company that is competing with government researchers, walked away from talks over cooperation and patent opportunities last month.

The White House and directors of the public-private Human Genome Project denied that the timing of the announcement from President Clinton and British Prime Minister Tony Blair was intended to put pressure on Celera or other private firms.

The United States and Britain are the leading partners in the nonprofit Human Genome Project, which plans to publish a full genetic map on the Internet by 2003. The information would be free and available to all researchers.

"To realize the full promise of this research, raw fundamental data on the human genome, including the human DNA sequence and its variations, should be made freely available to scientists everywhere," Clinton and Blair said.

"Unencumbered access to this information will promote discoveries that will reduce the burden of disease, improve health around the world and enhance the quality of life for all humankind," they said. "Intellectual property protection for gene-based inventions will also play an important role in stimulating the development of important new health care projects."

White House press secretary Joe Lockhart said the sharing of data would accelerate scientific advances.

As a practical matter, he said, the U.S. Patent Office has decided that scientists cannot obtain patents for individual genes. However, he said, "If you develop a vaccine or something off of the genetic data — that will continue to have intellectual property rights."

Wall Street quickly reacted to the announcement of the agreement, which puts the brakes on several companies' plans to sell genetic data to drug makers and researchers.

Residency regulations pose problems for student

By MAGGIE MARTIN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Unforeseen circumstances and a residency law that allows for few exceptions might prevent Anthony Von Plinsky, junior in graphic design, from reaching his goal of becoming a K-State graduate.

"If someone wants to come to K-State and graduate, I want them to be aware of how the entire system works," Von Plinsky said. "If someone has the power to the change it for other students, I hope they can."

The law dealing with military dependent students and residency is a federal statute from the 1940s. It states that military personnel stationed in the state should be treated as any other resident.

As long as personnel remain in active duty in the state, their dependents may receive in-state tuition.

Von Plinsky moved to Kansas in 1997, when his father was stationed at Fort Leavenworth. He attended Kansas City Kansas Community College and graduated in May 1999.

In August 1999, he enrolled at K-State and attended classes. He received a bill for in-state tuition Aug. 15.

The determination day for deciding in-state and out-of-state tuition is the first day of classes. Von Plinsky's parents moved out of Kansas one week before classes began in August.

When he went to pre-enroll for the spring semester he found a block on his account. Von Plinsky received another bill Nov. 15, which reflected nearly $3,000 in back tuition.

If Von Plinsky's parents had remained in the state another week, he would have continued to receive the residency privilege.

Von Plinsky also was unaware of all the paperwork he was required to fill out in order to keep paying in-state tuition.

When students fill out an application for admission, they check a box if they are military dependent. Two other forms are filled out to verify the person on whom they are dependent is on active duty in the state.

One form is a military dependent/spouse verification and is returned to the Admissions Office. The other is a Kansas Board of Regents application for Kansas resident privilege for military personnel and is returned to Enrollment Services.

Because the Kansas resident privilege form never was filled out, Von Plinsky was forced to pay the out-of-state tuition bill.

"Just like with any arbitrary day, some students will benefit while others will not," Don Foster, university registrar, said. "It is important for students to know and understand their residency status. Otherwise, fees will be assessed and due."

Because Von Plinsky's father was stationed elsewhere in the United States, and the paperwork was not filled out, he lost the privilege to keep in-state tuition.

"It's really a shame that students can't keep the residency privilege, but we're bound by regulations and the law," said Joe Barron, attorney for the regents.

Ryan Donahue, sophomore in print journalism, has to fill out a stack of paperwork every semester in order to keep his in-state tuition privilege.

"If I don't go to enrollment services to pick up the forms and fill them out, then I will receive a bill for out-of-state tuition," Donahue said. "It is my responsibility to have to do all this."

If students have a problem with their residency status, they can appeal their case to the Student Residency Appeal Board.

After Von Plinsky found out he would not continue receiving in-state tuition, he had to apply for loans and credit cards to pay off his tuition bill.

He now is attending KCKCC and waiting to hear if he received a scholarship that would help him afford the out-of-state tuition at K-State.

He doesn't know if he ever will be able to attend K-State again.

"I wish I had been notified earlier of the situation," Von Plinsky said. "I could have cut my losses and moved on. I want other students to be aware that this can happen and how to avoid it. If it does happen to them, I may not know them, but I will know what they are going through."

Galen Morrison and Joe Leonard watch as K-State's new men's basketball coach Jim Wooldridge addresses the media and fans at Tuesday afternoon's press conference at Bramlage Coliseum.

JUSTIN HAYWORTH/COLLEGIAN

Choice may prove to be best one yet

RICHARD SMITH

As a follower of K-State men's basketball, it was tough to feel good about the direction Wildcat hoops was headed this past weekend.

First, there was the whipping by Kansas (the 274th in a row), which concluded a 9-19 season. Then there was the messy "resignation" of Tom Asbury, followed closely by a "nationwide" search for a replacement that actually took fewer than 24 hours and covered all of about two city blocks in suburban Chicago.

From a skeptical K-State fan's standpoint, it seemed unlikely that an inept basketball program conducting a seemingly inept coaching search would produce an heir apparent capable of winning back disenchanted (and increasingly scarce) Wildcat hoops fans.

So far, it hasn't won anyone back. The announcement Saturday of former Chicago Bulls assistant Jim Wooldridge as the new K-State skipper has inspired the kind of fan enthusiasm usually reserved for IRS audits, police speed traps and the Bowl Championship Series.

Fan response notwithstanding, K-State might have something here. Unlike as it seems, K-State's confused, contradictory, haphazard, spin-doctored search for a new basketball coach actually might have turned up the right guy for the job.

Just listen to what Los Angeles Lakers assistant coach Tex Winter has to say about the guy:

"I was really amazed and impressed with Jim and his grasp of the game of basketball," Winter said in a recent news release. "I think he'll fit in beautifully at Kansas State. He's a wonderful choice, and I can't think of anyone that I know who would be a better fit at K-State."

Now, some of that is smiley, happy news-release rhetoric, granted, but this is Tex Winter talking, not Max Urlick or Jon Wefald. The man owns six NBA championship rings and the second-most victories in K-State basketball history. He is the father of the triangle offense, one of the most successful schemes in modern basketball. As basketball authorities go, they don't get much more authoritative than Winter.

Yet, in chat rooms, call-in shows and coffee houses, fans have pointed to Wooldridge's 99-99 record at his previous NCAA Division I coaching stops and 26-97 record as a Bulls assistant as proof that the Wildcats are walking into another Asbury-shaped sinkhole.

Taken by themselves, Wooldridge's D-I coaching numbers are misleading. He took over a moribund Southwest Texas State program and led it to the school's first-ever NCAA Tournament bid.

At his next stop, he took over a Louisiana Tech team that was coming off of a 2-25 season AND was hampered by NCAA probation AND had to compete for talent with in-state basketball power LSU. He compiled a 52-59 record with the Bulldogs before leaving to coach in the NBA, and the program since has recorded a Sun Belt Conference championship and a second-place conference finish with players Wooldridge recruited.

As for his tenure with the Bulls, bear in mind that these were the Dickey Simpkins/Randy Brown Bulls, not the Michael Jordan/Scottie Pippen variety. Being a Bulls assistant as the post-Jordan era began was akin to being promoted to first mate of the Titanic about five minutes after it hit the iceberg.

He might not be the decorated, awe-inspiring, "name" coach that K-State fans had hoped for, but everyone has to start some

Favorable opinions being formed about new men's basketball coach

By DEREK BOSS

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jim Wooldridge received a warm reception from K-State players, fans and administration alike at a noon press conference Tuesday at Bramlage Coliseum.

Max Urlick, athletics director, displayed his utmost confidence in Wooldridge, a former Chicago Bulls assistant coach.

"We absolutely got the best man," Urlick said. "He knows that he will prove over and over again that he is the right guy. Our friend Tex Winter repeatedly validated Jim's fit for KSU, as well as his technical knowledge of the game of basketball."

"I have hope for Kansas State basketball, I feel great for Kansas State basketball and Jim Wooldridge is our leader for this fresh start."

President Jon Wefald echoed Urlick's sentiments. "If we can turn football around, can there be any doubt that with the right person at the right place at the right time — namely, Jim Wooldridge — that we can turn basketball around?"

"We want to rejuvenate this program. Can we do it? Absolutely. Period. Amen. Good night."

Several Wildcat players were in attendance at the press conference, including sophomore Josh Kimm, junior Joe Leonard and former junior guard Galen Morrison.

Morrison said he will have an individual meeting with Wooldridge sometime after spring break to evaluate his status with the team. Morrison was suspended indefinitely Feb. 19 by former head coach Tom Asbury for disciplinary reasons not released to the public. Morrison would not specifically comment on details concerning the suspension.

"I would love to be a part of this team next year, but Coach Wooldridge will make that decision," Morrison said.

The Omaha native said he was impressed overall with K-State's new basketball coach.

"The main thing I noticed about Coach Wooldridge is that he's real confident," Morrison said. "He wants to come in and win, and he wants to change things around and bring fans back to the games."

"He seems really confident that he can come in and get the job done — and guys look up to a guy like that, especially when they come in and automatically have a lot of confidence in themselves and in their players."

Leonard said the team needs to stay focused and capture this new opportunity for K-State basketball.

"I think everybody's excited for a change," Leonard said. "We're disappointed, because I think Coach Asbury had a rough season, but the past is gone now and we need to look to the future."

"What I've seen from (Wooldridge) today, he's very personable, and I think he's willing to work with us and work with the people around here to make us better."

Kimm said that despite not knowing a lot about the new coach, he thinks Wooldridge seems to be a nice fit in the Cats' program, as long as fans and supporters give him a fair chance.

"I'd hate to see people start judging him already, which I've already seen happen," Kimm said. "Hopefully, the people around here will take to him, and we can just all pull together. That'll just make us that much stronger."

In regards to Winter's high praise for Wooldridge's coaching ability, Kimm said it makes the team realize the quality of coach they received.

"That just makes us respect him that much more, 'cause obviously Tex Winter and Tim Floyd are respected for the jobs that they've done with the Bulls, and what Tim Floyd did at Iowa State," Kimm said. "Obviously, we're going to have to listen to him, and we've got to give him respect. We're real excited."

From an administrative perspective, Associate Director of Athletics for Development Michael O'Brien said K-State is honored to add Wooldridge to its staff.

"Coach Wooldridge is very impressive," O'Brien said. "He's going to be a real fan favorite, going throughout the state and talking to our various constituent groups, such as the Catbacker clubs."

"People are really going to be attracted to Jim. I thought he put his best foot forward today."

Urlick explains process of Asbury's resignation

By JOSHUA KINDER

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tom Asbury resigned. Jim Wooldridge is his replacement.

But it was not until Tuesday at the press conference at Bramlage Coliseum introducing Wooldridge as new coach that Athletics Director Max Urlick cleared up details concerning Asbury's resignation and the hiring of Wooldridge.

According to Urlick, Asbury was notified Feb. 23 that he had the option of resigning or at the end of the season, his contract would be terminated. Oddly enough, the day Asbury knew of his short future at K-State was the same day the Wildcats broke their 11-game losing streak with a win over Texas A&M.

Asbury agreed to resign but did not want to announce it until the end of the season, and Urlick agreed.

Following K-State's first-round elimination in the Phillips 66 Big 12 Tournament, Urlick and Asbury agreed upon the press-release statement that was issued to the media Friday morning.

"After the game, in the locker room, I gave Tom the prearranged statement, one-sentence statement, a copy of the press release, prearranged, agreed-to language and that was it," Urlick said.

Urlick said he met with Asbury prior to the season's start and designed some guidelines that were important to keeping his job. One of the stipulations Urlick spoke of Tuesday was that Asbury had to achieve at least an even record within the conference season.

"We jointly agreed what the objectives would be," Urlick said. "When I became concerned as January and February moved in, I had another meeting with Tom in mid-February."

"We discussed then the fortunes of the basketball team, recalled the criteria, and we discussed the potential conclusion of the season."

Two days later Urlick said Asbury's and K-State's attorneys began negotiations regarding Asbury's contract, which was going to be prematurely broken by K-State.

Saturday, Urlick told the Collegian that K-State still was in the process of working out an agreement with Asbury, and that the details would not be made public when the settlement is agreed upon.

After a relatively quick announcement of Wooldridge as the new coach, Urlick said he first met with Wooldridge on March 3 in Chicago.

Urlick said he used an outside consulting agency to find Wooldridge. In fact, 27 coaches were on the list of candidates presented to Urlick, but Wooldridge's name was the one that continued to reappear — and he was the only candidate Urlick interviewed.

"I confidentially enlisted the services of independent consultants to develop a list of 20 to 25 prospective head coach candidates for Kansas State University," Urlick said.

"The consultant researched and analyzed these prospective candidates through cross-checks, extensive background investigation matching specific criteria, and one name repeatedly surfaced as the best match, and that name was Jim Wooldridge."

However, as of Thursday, following K-State's elimination from the conference tournament, Urlick said he had not spoken to anyone regarding the coaching position.

"If I would have had a little more time, I would have answered that question differently," Urlick said. "You (the media) caught me, and I misspoke."

Wooldridge, who has a losing career record at the Division-I level, visited Manhattan for the first time Saturday, and it was then that Wooldridge said he and the athletic department agreed to a five-year contract that has been reported to be worth $400,000 per year.

Tennis team returns home to face Missouri after road trip

By DEREK BOSS

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Returning to its home court for the first time since Feb. 20, the women's tennis team will battle Missouri at 2:30 p.m. today in Manhattan.

The matchup marks K-State's Big 12 Conference home opener for the spring season. The Wildcats (6-4, 1-0) won their conference road opener 7-2 Saturday over Texas Tech in Lubbock.

Missouri (3-9, 1-5) has a 2-6 record this year on the road, including a winless 0-4 mark in conference play. Last spring, the Tigers finished in a tie for 11th place in the Big 12 with a 7-16, 2-9 record.

Although the Tigers appear to be a feeble team on paper, K-State head coach Steve Bietau begs to differ. "Despite what their record would show, this is a program on the way up," he said. "Previously, they were simply not supported enough to be competitive in the conference, and that's been changing in the past couple of years. It takes time to get stronger, and they've shown evidence of doing that."

Such evidence includes the Tigers' 2-7 defeat of the Wildcats in Columbia last spring, which adds fuel to the fire for K-State.

"There was a time when we could look at them as an easy match, but that time has passed," Bietau said.

Still, Missouri is coming off two straight losses, as the team fell to Minnesota on Saturday, as well as their arch-rival Kansas on March 8.

The Tigers are led by freshman Kristina Olshanskaya, who recorded the team's only wins in the 2-7 loss to the Jayhawks in Lawrence.

Olshanskaya won her singles match 7-5, 6-2, and teamed with senior Joni Jordan to claim victory at No. 3 doubles for Missouri.

K-State saw Olshanskaya in regional competition this past fall. Wildcat freshman Petra Sedlmajerova defeated her in the November tournament in Salt Lake City.

"She has a nice game — she proved to be a tough fighter," Bietau said of Olshanskaya's play at regionals. "It was apparent that she doesn't enjoy losing, so I think she can definitely be a factor in this match."

Heading into the Missouri matchup, Bietau said the Wildcats can learn something from the less-than-stellar victory against Texas Tech.

"We didn't play all that well in the Tech match," he said. "It was a win, but we could've played better. If the players got one thing out of the match, it was knowing that it feels a lot better when you play well and win."

Students packing for vacation should remember essentials

By RAEGAN TONEY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's almost here.

K-State students are preparing for their long-awaited spring break, and packing for the trip might be the most difficult aspect: getting as much stuff packed into the smallest possible space, yet not forgetting the bare essentials.

Research and knowing ahead of time what to prepare for will save a lot of time packing and maybe even some extra space for those souvenirs that will be coming home.

Keiko Fukumura, public-relations representative for Yahoo! Travel, said students should go to travel.yahoo.com to figure out how to pack for their spring-break destination. Everything from weather information to local maps to health risks for your destination is available.

For students who will be flying to their spring break destination, Brenda Simons, district office manager for Manhattan AAA, said there are limitations to luggage that can be taken onto the plane.

"Most airlines request that you only have two checked bags that don't exceed 70 pounds per bag," Simons said.

Checked luggage is the luggage that is put in the baggage area of the plane, Simons said. As far as carry-on luggage, Simons said each airline differs, but most only will allow one carry-on bag.

"Small enough so that it can fit under the seat or in the overhead compartment," Simons said. "They don't count a girl's purse as a carry-on."

Thinking about what you will need the most is what Simons said should be put into a carry-on bag.

"Medications that need to be taken should never be checked," Simons said. "Not checking medications is a big deal. You should always take them in your carry-on."

Simons also said if one is worried about lost or delayed luggage, it is a good idea to pack at least one change of clothes in a carry-on bag.

Lost luggage is not much of a concern anymore, Simons said. She said if something happens to luggage, it's usually a delay problem and is fixed right away.

Amy Campbell, senior in marketing, said she is a last-minute packer and is not going to add much to her suitcase, as she is trying to save money.

"I'm just going to California to visit some relatives," Campbell said. "I'm usually last-minute, so I'm trying to save some money, and I'll probably go tanning."

Outdoor committee sponsors trips

By CHRISTIE VANOVER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Some K-State students are taking advantage of the time off during spring break to explore the outdoors.

The Union Program Council's Outdoor Adventure Committee has planned three quests during the week. One group is hiking Georgia's Appalachian Mountains, another exploring the natural wonders of the Southwest and the last experiencing the cold of Colorado.

"We plan each trip with both novices and experts in mind," Aaron Sefton, sophomore in music composition, said. "Anybody could go on all of these trips. There is no certain level you have to be."

Sefton is leading the backpacking tour down 50 miles of the Appalachian Trail, in the heart of the Chattahoochee National Forest. Last year, he led a backpacking trip down the Buffalo River in Arkansas.

"I do quite a bit of backpacking," he said. "It's my sport."

On the Appalachian Trail trip, Sefton said standard backpackers can do 8-12 miles with a backpack. He plans to keep the pace moderate and do about 8 miles a day.

After the day's hike, the group of eight students will set up camp and eat dehydrated meals and explore sights such as Anna Ruby Falls, which is about a mile off the trail.

On the other side of the United States, Nate Kettle, junior in geology, and Alex Miller, freshman in range science, are leading the "Tour of the West."

"We're going to do a series of day hikes into different national parks," Miller said.

The group will tour Arches National Park, Capitol Reef National Park, Zion National Park and Bryce Canyon National Park, all in Utah, and one of the seven natural wonders of the world, Arizona's Grand Canyon National Park.

"The second day at the Grand Canyon, we'll either hike halfway down or all the way down the canyon," Miller said.

One Norwegian, two Portuguese and two Polish students are making the voyage to the west. Miller said they want to go because these are places they have heard of and want to see.

"A lot of people have not explored America," Sefton said. "That's why the trips are pleasing to international students."

These two trips filled up within the first day of signups, Sefton said, but the trip to Gunnison, Colo., took a little longer.

"It took two weeks for this one to fill up, because it was a little more hard core," he said, "a little more intense."

A far cry from the sandy beaches of Florida, Colorado's freezing temperatures set the stage for some extreme winter sports.

The group is snowshoeing, ice fishing and skiing through Colorado's Rocky Mountains.

They're taking advantage of the fact that Colorado doesn't unfreeze until April, Sefton said.

"This is the first time we've had three trips over spring break that I'm aware of," Sefton said. "It shows that the committee is getting bigger."

One attraction, said Gina Kimble, committee adviser and graduate assistant in student affairs, is the low cost.

The tours run around $150, which includes transportation, most meals, permits and camping costs.

"If you try doing it yourself, getting in your car and driving, it would cost a lot. In a group, it's more cost-conservative," Miller said. "It's a lot of fun, too."

Although this year's spring break trips are filled, the camping season is not over. The Outdoor Adventure Committee is planning another camping trip April 7-9 to Elk City in southeastern Kansas.

Registration begins after spring break in the UPC office, on the third floor of the K-State Student Union.

Following the trip, just before Earth Day, the committee will be host to a variety of events for Outdoor Awareness Week, April 9-15.

It has planned paintball activities, a bird-of-prey exhibit from Milford Lake, scuba experts, a reptile display, a disc-golf tournament at Tuttle Creek, and more.

"This is an excellent way to get people excited about the outdoors," Sefton said.

Kennedy nephew denies murder charges

By DENISE LAVOIE
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

STAMFORD, Conn. — After nearly 25 years, a woman and the Kennedy nephew accused of murdering her daughter faced each other in court for the first time Tuesday.

"You've got the wrong guy," Michael Skakel told Dorothy Moxley. Skakel, 39, was arraigned as a juvenile in the October 1975 killing of Martha Moxley. Both Skakel and Martha Moxley were 15 at the time. He did not enter a plea and has denied any involvement in her death.

In a four-minute court appearance, Skakel heard the charge read aloud and was advised of his rights. Skakel was charged with being a juvenile delinquent based on an underlying charge of murder.

A moment later, he stunned the crowded courtroom when he walked over to Dorothy Moxley, seated in the front row, and told her, "Dorothy, I feel your pain, but you've got the wrong guy."

She did not respond. "We'll find out in court," Martha's brother, John Moxley, told Skakel.

Afterward, John Moxley said Skakel's comment was just for himself — just theater.

"I think for 24 years, they've thought they're above the law," he said of the Skakels. "We're going to find out now."

Dorothy Moxley said Skakel's remark sounded rehearsed and made no difference to her.

"I really feel as though I know what happened," she said.

Defense lawyer Michael Sherman said Skakel was sincere.

"Michael Skakel has no idea who killed Martha Moxley. If he did, he'd be the first one to tell the state's attorney," Sherman said.

Skakel is the son of Rushton Skakel Sr., the brother of Sen. Robert F. Kennedy's widow, Ethel.

The Skakels and the Moxleys were neighbors in an exclusive enclave in upscale Greenwich. Martha was beaten to death the night of Oct. 30, 1975, with a golf club later traced to a set owned by the Skakels.

No charges ever were filed.

Moxley's case was reopened after more than two decades when an investigative grand jury was appointed in June 1998. The appointment followed the publication of books about the case, including one by former Los Angeles police Detective Mark Fuhrman.

He identified Skakel as the likely killer in his book. Prosecutors deny that Fuhrman's book had any influence on their investigation.

Because of confidentiality laws surrounding juvenile cases, Skakel's arraignment normally would have been closed to the public. But Judge Maureen Dennis, acting on a request from five newspapers and The Associated Press, agreed to open the proceeding.

Dennis found that Skakel effectively had waived his confidentiality rights, both because he is an adult and because his name and the charges against him already were well-known.

Bridgeport State's Attorney Jonathan Benedict said it will take at least a year for the case to go to trial.

"It's a 25-year-old case. I don't think it was handed to the state on a silver platter here, but we did an awful lot of work in the case ... and I'm looking forward to trying it," Benedict said.

A reasonable cause hearing, when prosecutors must prove there is enough evidence to proceed with the case, is scheduled for June 20.

3 Michigan men convicted of involuntary manslaughter

By JIM IRWIN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

DETROIT — Three young men were convicted of involuntary manslaughter Tuesday in the date-rape-drug death of a 15-year-old girl. A fourth was convicted of a lesser charge.

In one of the nation's first trials involving a death linked to the date-rape drug GHB, jurors also found Joshua Cole, 19, Daniel Brayman, 18, and Nicholas Holtschlag, 18, guilty of lesser poisoning charges.

Erick Limmer, 26, was found guilty of one count each of being an accessory to manslaughter, poisoning, delivery of marijuana and possession of GHB, or gamma-hydroxybutyrate. Earlier this month, the judge threw out a manslaughter count against Limmer.

The manslaughter conviction carries a sentence of up to 15 years in prison. The penalty for the lesser poisoning conviction is up to five years. Sentencing was set for March 30.

Prosecutors alleged the men gave Samantha Reid a soft drink secretly spiked with GHB during a Jan. 16, 1999, party at Limmer's Grosse Ile apartment. She died the next day. Her friend Melanie Sindone, now 16, also ingested the drug and briefly was in a coma, but survived.

Samantha's mother Judi Clark and Sindone hugged each other in the courtroom after the verdicts were read. The four defendants showed no emotion, but Cole's mother cried.

GHB is a colorless and odorless drug that can make a victim unconscious within 20 minutes. Victims often have no memory of what happened and the drug is hard to trace.

QUOTES

FROM DEB PATTERSON

"I would do anything for them to have gone out with a 20-win season or with a greater run through the tournament, but they left their mark, and they've given us something to build upon."

ON THE GUARDS:

"She was our best perimeter defender, our most experienced guard, and she could rebound for us," Patterson said after Jenny Coalson was lost for the season to a hip flexor injury. "In losing Jenny, you lost that different dimension on the perimeter — that different sort of a guard. It's put greater pressure on players and exploited some of their weaknesses."

"It's the nature of our guards' strengths that they're great shooters but not real adept at being able to blow by somebody," Patterson said. "So, even if you have an adequate handle, if you don't have the quicks to go by somebody, you can struggle."

"She's going to be very tough to defend her third and fourth years in the program," Patterson said about Kristin Rethman before the team's first game against Nebraska. "Even today, Kristin Rethman at practice was the bomb. I walked over to the side and said, 'Wow.' Kristin looked tremendous today."

"When things weren't going right, and coach said we needed somebody to step up, I would try to step up, but I didn't know the proper way to step up," April Sailors said about her performance midway through conference play. "My way of stepping up was trying to dribble in and do everything when stepping up just meant making a good pass, making a good, open shot within the framework of our offense."

ON THE FIVE-GAME LOSING STREAK IN CONFERENCE PLAY:

"I felt like we had to make some sort of change if we were really doing our job because we weren't taking positive steps," Patterson said after making line-up changes after the team's loss at Missouri. "We were sort of stuck where we were at."

"I can remember the last thing was the buzzer went off, and Nicky and I looked at each other and were like, 'Finally,'" forward Angie Finkes said after breaking the streak at Oklahoma State. "It felt so good to win. It was almost like we'd forgotten what it felt like to win, because we had lost so many times."

ON THE SEASON:

"I expected us to do much better than we have done. I think we can be a better team than we were this year. We just lost too many close games this year."

FINKES SAID PRIOR TO LOSING A CLOSE GAME TO OKLAHOMA STATE IN THE BIG 12 TOURNAMENT.

ON THE FIRST ROUND EXIT FROM THE BIG 12 TOURNAMENT:

"I was real proud of the run that we made at that team when it would have been very easy to fold up tent," Patterson said after the Cats shrunk a 25-point Oklahoma State lead to six in the second half. "I thought that was one of the most phenomenal runs that I've seen in a long time. I'm just sorry we had to be on the back end of trying to make it."

Players earn All-Big 12 honors after final season

The achievements of this year's women's basketball senior class will be remembered long after the players have graduated.

At first glance, however, it might appear that with a 13-17 season record and no postseason appearance, the efforts that Jenny Coalson, Angie Finkes, Olga Firsova and Nicky Ramage put into this season might have gone without reward. That notion is anything but true, assistant coach Sue Serafini said.

K-State women's basketball have given themselves, coaches and fans much of which to be proud, Serafini said.

During the past four years, in addition to helping rebuild a program that was under NCAA sanctions, the seniors have compiled impressive statistics. The Cats have gone 39-17 at home and appeared both in the NCAA and Women's National Invitation tournaments.

All four seniors also have rewritten the record books. Firsova blocked 100 shots and became the all-time block leader in just two seasons of play. Finkes and Ramage each scored more than 1,000 points and grabbed more than 500 rebounds. The two also spent all of this season among the conference scoring leaders. Finkes and Coalson also are among the K-State leaders in career starts.

This season, Finkes, Firsova and Ramage received honorable-mention All-Big-12 honors.

After the four seniors leave, Patterson said she will have a hard time replacing their hard work and talent. A blocked shot by Firsova, for instance, has become almost commonplace, Patterson said.

"I've gotten so used to watching her block shots inside that it's going to leave a huge hole," Patterson said.

Finkes said statistics cannot prove the individual and team improvement.

Although the appearances in statistical-leaders charts hint at a career-long commitment to improvement, they do not tell the whole story.

When the seniors first arrived on campus, they simply were freshmen learning the ropes from a senior class that took the team to the NCAA Tournament, Finkes said.

"It was definitely the senior class that year that carried it the whole way. They knew what it took," Finkes said. "We had no clue. We were just dumb little freshmen trying to run in there and remember the plays."

Ramage, for instance, came from a Class 1A high school where she could rely more on pure athletic talent. At K-State, she had to learn about the game, and, as a result, her accomplishments on the floor are that much more impressive, Patterson said.

"It is such a privilege to have coached Nicky," Patterson said. "I think it was appropriate on the day she broke the 1,000-point barrier, she conquered some of the things that earlier in her career she couldn't conquer."

Maybe more impressive than the records, however, is the quietness and dignity with which they were achieved. When Ramage scored her 1,000th point in a loss to Missouri, she was more concerned with the loss than with the milestone.

"It would have meant a lot more if we had won the game — definitely," Ramage said. "You know, I really don't even think about it, I just want to win the game."

That kind of team-oriented attitude shown by the seniors made them an unforgettable class, Patterson said.

"Someday, when we take Kansas State basketball to the Sweet 16 and to the Final Eight, these players are going to be sitting right behind this staff in the most expensive, hard-to-get seats in the house," Patterson said, "because I'll never forget what they've given."

EVAN SEMON/COLLEGEIAN

K-State head coach Deb Patterson said the 61-43 loss to Kansas was the team's poorest offensive performance of the season.

The four seniors' freshman year also was the present coaching staff's first year at K-State, and the coaches have relied on the seniors in building the program, Serafini said.

"They've been a cornerstone of this program," Serafini said. "They've helped us achieve everything that we've achieved thus far, and they have helped really lay down the foundation and the groundwork for where women's basketball here at Kansas State is going to go."

The contributions these four seniors have made to which the team struggles with full-court pressure, leads to shake-ups in the line-up.

Feb. 5 — Senior forward Nicky Ramage scores the 1000th point of her career in K-State's 68-72 loss to Missouri in Manhattan.

Feb. 13 — K-State knocks off a ranked team by defeating No. 8 Iowa State 69-63 in Manhattan. The team even gets one vote for the Top 25.

March 1 — K-State wins its final home and regular-season game of the year by defeating Colorado 64-47. It also is the final game for four seniors Coalson, forward Angie Finkes, center Olga Firsova and forward Nicky Ramage. Finkes chalks up her seventh double-double of the season with 22 points and 13 rebounds. Coalson, in her first court appearance since her injury, plays two minutes and scores two points.

March 7 — In the opening round of the Big 12 Tournament, K-State narrowly loses to Oklahoma State. Although down by 25 at one time in the second half, the Cats made a run to close to within six points of the Cowboys. During the run, K-State depended greatly on what could be its future, sophomore guard Kristin Rethman, who hit five three-pointers on the way to scoring a team-high 19 points.

Nov. 19 — K-State's first game of the season is a 59-57 home victory against Drake.

Nov. 27 — The Cats play their first ranked opponent, No. 7 N.C. State on the road, and narrowly lose 72-73.

Dec. 18 — During the Cats' 66-76 loss to Wichita State in Manhattan, starting guard Jenny Coalson is lost for the season after aggravating a strained hip flexor.

Jan. 5 — K-State enters its first conference game, at Texas, with a 7-6 non-conference mark. The Longhorns man-handle the Cats 58-80.

Jan. 8 — A harbinger of things to come, as K-State loses its second conference game at home to No. 23 Kansas 54-70. The weaknesses exploited by the Jayhawks, slow guards and inconsistent shooting, would haunt K-State all year.

WOOLDRIDGE

spoke about the tradition surrounding the basketball program.

He talked about the coaches and players who came before his regime and the tradition they left. Wooldridge then said he wanted to rebuild the program through teamwork, and he spoke directly to K-State President Jon Wefald.

"Dr. Wefald, thank you. As I have told Max and I will tell you, you will always get a good day's work from Jim, and our program will represent you, it will represent your university and everyone in this room and it will represent everyone that is associated with Kansas State."

He also spoke about an earlier conversation he had had with the players.

"I said, 'You guys take a look at all the banners around here, and we can have a great program again,'" Wooldridge said.

He also told the players the team is going to start over, and he wants them to establish a swagger.

"We are coming off a season where they didn't do so well, and we have to re-establish their self esteem and re-establish the K-State ego," Wooldridge said.

Wooldridge said he wants to run a style of play that reflects the team's talent level.

"I have always thought style of play reflects as much talent as you have. We would love to play a real flowed offense — a real rhythmic offense," Wooldridge said. "I know in this league you have to defend, you have to take good shots and you have to play together. For you to be successful, you have to be smart."

In his head coaching career at Louisiana Tech and other schools, he has a losing record. Wooldridge said this record can be attributed to the types of programs he inherited. He also said he left the programs in better condition than he found them.

The question is whether he can turn this program around, and Wefald said he believes Wooldridge is the right man for the task.

"Absolutely, if we can turn football around, can there be any doubt that with the right person at the right place at the right time, mainly Jim Wooldridge, that we can turn basketball around, a program that has a rich tradition here, and been to about 23 or 24 NCAA tournaments?" Wefald said.

Wefald talked about the different recommendations that the university has received on Wooldridge. He said he was impressed with what Chicago Bulls head coach Tim Floyd had to say. Wefald said Floyd said he was one of the greatest turnaround experts in American college basketball today.

"We know he can do it, because he is a first rate coach. He is going to be the head recruiter and he will hire people that are going to be recruiting constantly," Wefald said.

He also said Wooldridge will be able to connect with the K-State faithful around the country.

"We have a coach who is gonna connect with you, with our students, our faculty and our alumni," Wefald said. "All over America, they are going to love him."

of the meeting that was scheduled for today.

themselves because of their newness to campus. However, he said they have been co-sponsoring Student Governing Association activities such as last week's Box Village, a program promoting awareness of the plight of the homeless. He said it is important to start bringing men on campus together according to all their interests, rather than continuing to organize students solely based on their academic interests.

"Right now, people are brought together based on what their major is," Higley said. "With the fraternity, guys will have the opportunity to be brought together with common values."

Schone said he thinks other fraternities will begin emerging because of the initial steps of the Brotherhood fraternity. He said he does not feel sororities will be created as quickly because of the lower population of women on the Salina campus and lack of interest from those who are there. However, he said he thinks a greek system at K-State-Salina is in the near future for all students.

"I imagine that within a couple of years, there will be other fraternities with different ideals and personalities that will begin popping up," Schone said. "There are not as many women on campus to get sororities started, but other people have begun talking about starting more fraternities on campus."

Hostetler said the new meeting was called to get the IFC, Panhellenic Council, chapter presidents and advisers together to discuss suggestions and reforms.

"I think we are going to deal with some of our requests for an evaluation, as well as have the IFC and PHC respond to our suggestions," Hostetler said.

K-State lures famous violinist

Naoko Shimizu gives students opportunity to expand music interests

Story By Danedri Thompson ■ Courtesy Photo

Young Concert Artists Inc., a management company, has a track record with talented artists. She won first prize at the 1995 Markneukirchen International Competition in Germany and at the 1996 Geneva International Music Competition.

At least, it is full of talent in Richard P. Martin's mind. A partnership between the company and K-State brought a clarinetist and a marimbist to Manhattan earlier this year. Their third instrumentalist to visit K-State, Naoko Shimizu, is a violinist.

Martin, director of McCain Auditorium, said Shimizu is one of the company's most talented artists. She won first prize at the 1995 Markneukirchen International Competition in Germany and at the 1996 Geneva International Music Competition.

Shimizu will perform a sonata by J.S. Bach, along with piano and viola pieces by Robert Schumann and Georges Enesco, at her concert at 7:30 tonight in McCain Auditorium.

"It's an opportunity to explore something that most towns of 40,000 people usually wouldn't be able to hear," Martin said.

Martin said those who listen to classical music occasionally might recognize a few of the pieces, especially "Pictures from Fairyland" by Schumann.

"It gets played frequently enough on classical radio stations that people might recognize that," he said.

Although Martin said some people in Manhattan might not be interested in the music, he said the concert will be a good opportunity for college students and community members to explore something new.

College students should be especially interested in hearing her music, Martin said.

"College, we think over here in McCain, is an opportunity for students to explore the world. This is an opportunity for them to explore that," he said. "It's a chance to enrich one's experience."

"You should have an opportunity to go while you're a student. That ought to be part of your education, just like taking a chemistry class."

Ted Conrad, Fine Arts Council member, said students should be interested in the concert because they help pay for it. He said in return for paying $9 in fine arts fees, students get tickets to McCain events at 50 percent of the cost to the general public. He said he thinks that is a bargain.

"McCain does a great job with bringing in world-renowned artists," Conrad said. "It's very affordable rates for students."

Only a portion of that $9 fee goes to McCain, Conrad said.

"Even less than that is going to one specific performance, so they're paying less than $9 in fees for reduced prices for tickets," he said.

However, Martin said, it is not dollars but dress code that keeps many students from seeing McCain performances.

"One of the real problems of attracting students to a concert like this is persuading them that they don't have to dress up like they were going to a wedding or a funeral. They can wear a sweater," he said. "We try to be a friendly place for people to come."

He said regardless of whether students wear a sweater or a suit to Shimizu's concert, they will not be disappointed.

"It's not as popular as McDonald's, but it's certainly worth the effort," Martin said.

■ SHIMIZU WILL PERFORM AT 7:30 TONIGHT IN MCCAIN AUDITORIUM.

Local poet to present work at Java Espresso & Bakery

By NATALIA FARMER
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

He was told by his high school teacher at age 15 that he never should put pen to paper.

Years and poems later, local poet Andy Burd is presenting his work at 8 p.m. Thursday at Java Espresso & Bakery in Aggieville. The event is sponsored in part by the Union Program Council.

Heide McBride, UPC program adviser, said that because of Burd's popularity, the Thursday night reading will be different from the previous open-mike poetry performances.

"The show will be about an hour long and is not open mike, it's dedicated to Andy only because people enjoy his readings so much," she said. "He's one of the best local poets, because he's so popular and well-liked."

McBride said that usually anyone can get up and share poetry with the average audience of 30 people.

She said this reading will be a chance to listen to the passionate themes that are portrayed in Burd's poetry.

"He has a huge variety of great experiences in his poems," McBride said. "Funny and serious themes run through his work as he talks about the places he's visited and his personal life."

Originally from Michigan, Burd said his love of poetry is partly because of his life experiences and military background, which has made him passionate about foreign places.

"Growing up, my father always made sure that we had a lot of books to read because he came from a family where only two out of nine children graduated from high school," he said. "He was always at yard sales or auctions buying books, which motivated me to read."

Burd said several themes run through his work, some of which he credits to his time spent working at a neural-rehabilitation clinic.

"I write about a lot of social and environmental issues, which include the treatment of people in institutions," he said. "I also focus on everyday topics, such as racial problems and drug abuse."

Burd said the Thursday night reading will be split into three parts.

He said the first is dedicated to eating disorders and depression, followed by the oral history in memorizing stories and ending with his emotional and humorous work.

"So much of poetry can get serious and deep, which is why I end the evening on a lighter note with my funny poems," he said.

Nathan Jenkins, Java employee, said Burd's personality helps him grab the audience's attention.

"His poems are filled with so much emotion of sadness and anger," he said. "We turn the music off when he's speaking, and the atmosphere becomes very attentive. I particularly like his memorization poems, because most poets just read, but Andy tells a story."

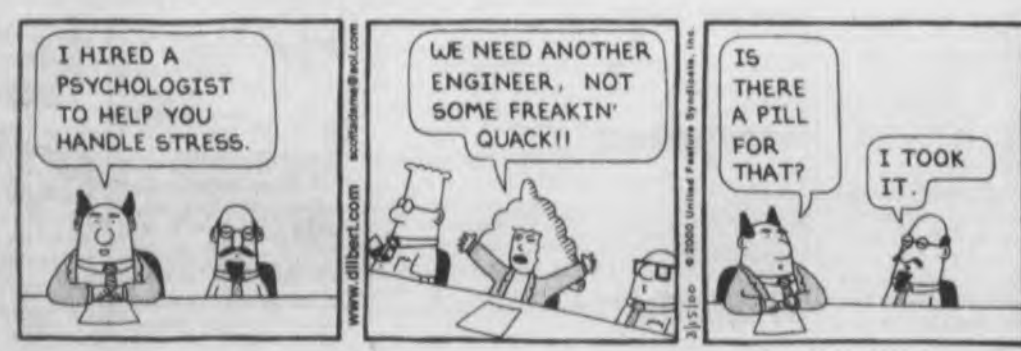

Jill Unruh, Java employee, said she thought Burd was a great character because of his passion for his writing.

"We get good turnouts because he truly loves it," she said. "He hangs out here a lot, and he'll perform any time for anyone."

Murder suspect surrenders in Junction City

MIKE SHEPHERD/COLLEGIAN

Geary County undersheriff Garry Berges answers questions at a press conference Wednesday morning in Junction City near the motel where a suspect was apprehended after fleeing to Kansas from Florida. The man, who allegedly kidnapped his wife and her son after killing a friend, was held up in the motel for five hours and surrendered only after his mother arrived on the scene.

By CRISTINA JANNEY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A man who held his wife and her 6-year-old son hostage in a standoff with police in Junction City early Wednesday morning is headed back to Florida today.

William Stroba, 29, of Havana, Fla., was wanted for probation violations and is suspected of beating a friend to death.

Stroba disappeared from his home in Florida and was thought to be headed to Liberal, Kan., where his mother lives.

A Geary County sheriff's deputy at about 11 p.m. Tuesday located the vehicle in which Stroba was suspected of traveling in a motel parking lot in Junction City.

"We were looking at hotels in the area," Sheriff William Deppish said. "We found it at the last motel at the last room. We got lucky."

He said the suspect told authorities that he had two weapons.

However, when Stroba gave himself up at a little before 9 a.m. Wednesday, no weapons were found.

"The other two people were uninjured. It turned out well," Deppish said.

The turning point in the investigation came when Stroba got a glance of his mother, who had been rushed to the scene by highway patrol troopers.

"Prior to that time, he said he would not surrender," the sheriff said. "When he saw her, that's when he came out."

About 60 law enforcement officers were on the scene from six different agencies. The motel was evacuated, and a four-block area was cordoned off.

Stroba's extradition Wednesday went much more quickly than normal, Deppish said.

Stroba was assigned a public defender after he told the judge he could not afford an attorney of his own.

After a brief consultation, Stroba agreed to extradition to Florida.

Florida investigators were supposed to head back to Florida with Stroba today, Deppish said.

No charges will be filed locally against Stroba.

Stroba is suspected of murdering an acquaintance of his, Robert Brown.

Brown, 29, was found Monday night lying in a pool of blood in Stroba's house.

The same day, Michelle Stroba left a note pleading for help scribbled on a paper towel in a restaurant bathroom in Munfordville, Ky.

The note describes Stroba's car. Credit-card charges also were used to help track Stroba.

Student takes K-State to court to regain status

By CRISTINA JANNEY
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Brian Jindra is taking K-State to court to try to regain his status as an in-state student.

Jindra, junior in microbiology, received in-state tuition from fall 1997 to spring 1999, according to court records.

Jindra's father was a soldier stationed at Fort Riley. He lived with his father and graduated from Manhattan High School.

According to a letter to Jindra from the university, when his father left active duty and decided not to live in Kansas, he lost his status as an in-state student.

Jindra appealed the decision through university channels and lost.

In-state students pay $65.50 per credit hour, and out-of-state students pay $275.65 per credit hour.

The petition filed in Riley County District Court alleges the university appeals committee was wrong in three ways.

According to the petition, the agency erroneously interpreted or applied the law. The decision of the agency was not based in fact, and the agency's record is unreasonable, arbitrary and capricious.

The court documents say Jindra has been employed in Kansas since 1997, has his car registered in Kansas, has a Kansas driver's license, has paid Kansas income tax and voted in Kansas.

The petition is supposed to be heard for judicial review within 30 days of its filing Feb. 16.

31 suffer injuries in train accident south of Topeka

By BECKY WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

CARBONDALE, Kan. — An Amtrak train derailed at about 1:55 a.m. Wednesday 20 miles southwest of Topeka, injuring 31 people.

Thirty of the injured were taken to Topeka hospitals, while one passenger with heart-attack-like symptoms was flown by Lifestar to St. Francis Hospital and Medical Center in critical condition, said Sgt. John Ikehorn, spokesman for the Kansas Highway Patrol.

The Southwest Chief No. 3 was en route from Chicago to Los Angeles when it derailed just southwest of the small town of Carbondale, near Morrill Road and West 141st Street. The 26-car train was carrying 155 passengers and 15 crew members.

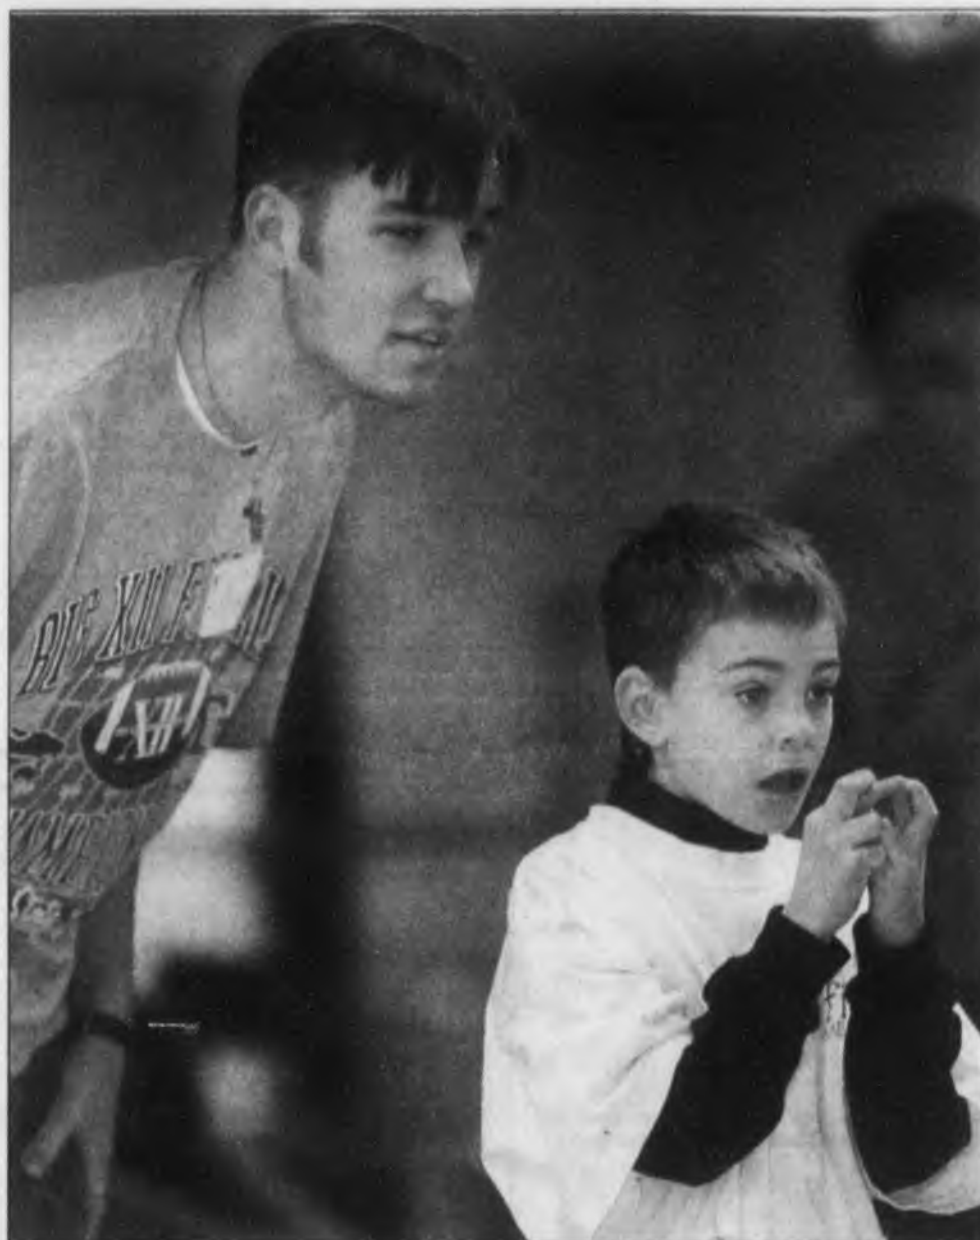

"There were 16 cars that were derailed off the track," Ikehorn said. "Seven of those 16 cars were actually laid to rest on their side. Five of the seven cars were passenger cars, and I'm told they were comprised of a lounge car, a diner car, two sleeper cars and a coach car."

Steve Forsberg, general director of public affairs for Burlington Northern Santa Fe, said data from the train indicated it was traveling at 61 mph when the accident occurred.

He said the train was traveling on a gentle curve on a line of track that normally sees light traffic, about a dozen trains daily, and that the cause of the accident was undetermined.

"We'll look at everything," Forsberg said. "Derailments, typically, the causes fall into one of three categories—either human error; mechanical error, in which case that means there's something wrong with a piece of equipment rolling over the track; or a defect in the track itself. We're not sure what caused this one — we'll obviously look at all three areas."

Volunteers Ain Action

Instructor introduces K-State students to community service in Hospitality Service Systems

Volunteer Tips

- Identify what area interests you.
- Determine when you can volunteer.
- Locate local volunteer agencies through the community service program at K-State, the Manhattan Public Library database or the Manhattan Mercury Web site.
- Call organizations and inquire about their volunteer needs. Be prepared to describe skills you can contribute toward the organization's cause.

He was frustrated. She was even more frustrated. It didn't seem to matter how hard she tried. Jill Stafford couldn't help the little boy remember his spelling words. Unable to understand how those words could be that hard to remember, she went home from her volunteer session, disappointed.

A week later, the little boy came back for more help. At first she wasn't sure if she could help him, or even if she wanted to try anymore. But, when he handed her his first-ever A+ on a spelling test, she knew she had no choice.

Each April, Pat Pesci embarks on a journey to introduce students to volunteer opportunities like Stafford's. He said he wants to show students how to give in order to receive. Instead of lecturing in class, he takes his students to the Manhattan Emergency Shelter, where they prepare meals for the needy.

He encourages his students to make a difference in the lives of others by volunteering.

Pesci's class, Hospitality Service Systems, is one of many classes at K-State that requires students to reach out to those in need. For more than 10 years, this class has helped students in the hotel and restaurant management program understand the importance of community service.

"We're building relationships when we volunteer," said Pesci, director of the hotel, restaurant, institution management and dietetics program. "That's what life is all about. We're showing the community that K-State students really do care and have an interest in society."

Carol Peak, director of K-State's community service program, said volunteerism with specific learning objectives, appropriate preparation, meaningful action and structured reflection can be an extremely effective teaching and learning tool.

"Students learn to deal with people different than them," Peak said. "They also discover the critical social issues facing our community and ways to address these issues."

Pesci said in-class community service opportunities are a great way to get students involved.

"Most of the time, students tell me they wish they would have started volunteering earlier," he said. "Once they get involved, they are more willing to participate in future service endeavors."

Students don't have to take a class or spend hours and hours to get involved with volunteering.

Brett Koster, freshman in open-option, works with the First Mentor program. The program is part of Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan Inc., but doesn't demand as much time as its parent organization. Like Big Brothers-Big Sisters, students are paired with children, but they meet only four times a semester.

"It's worth the time you put into it," Koster said.

Getting involved is the hardest part, said Stafford, a senior in agricultural economics who coordinates the community-service tutoring program.

"I began volunteering because it was a requirement for my leadership class," she said. "Looking back on it now, that was probably the best way to get me started. Once I started, I realized I couldn't quit."

However, these opportunities to volunteer in class are not required or set up by every curriculum. Judith Lynch, director of the Academic Assistance Center, said the community-service program is an excellent resource for students interested in volunteering. The community service program provides students with contact information and job descriptions of local volunteer opportunities.

Jon Durbin, sophomore in hotel and restaurant management, said it is difficult to find time to volunteer with so many other college-related activities.

Volunteering can fit into students' schedules if they want it to, said Kim Morgan, assistant professor in social work.

"If volunteering is important to students, then they can find time for it in the same way they find time to study, sleep, go to church, go to Aggierville, go to the Rec and have fun," Morgan said. "They shouldn't overdo it in any one of those areas, but rather budget their time and prioritize what needs to be done and when."

Betsy Barrett, associate professor in hotel, restaurant, institution management and dietetics, said prioritizing is essential.

"You have to select what is the most important to you and your future," Barrett said. "Then you plan your life and time around those things so you don't waste your time."

Service doesn't have to require a huge block of time, Peak said. Thirty minutes a week can make a big difference in somebody's life.

Anna Lear, junior in agricultural journalism and pre-veterinary medicine, said she makes time to volunteer at Sunset Zoological Park because it gives her the opportunity to get her nose out of the books and interact with people outside of the 18 to 25 age group.

"There is something about volunteering your time and expecting nothing in return that makes it that much more rewarding," Lear said. "People find it meaningful when they realize you are there because you want to be, and not just because you need the cash."

Road to Lafene to be closed next week for construction

Access by vehicle to Lafene Health Center will be difficult during spring break.

Dave DeBusman, project coordinator for Facilities Planning, said the access road connecting 17th Street to Lafene will be closed March 20 to 24.

DeBusman said the reason for the closure is the installment of chiller lines between the Power Plant and Seaton Hall. He said these lines will be used to cool Seaton without the use of a window air-conditioning system. The construction is part of the renovation of Seaton.

"Through the duration of spring break, there will not be any access into Lafene," DeBusman said. "Parking services have notified everyone and given them alternative places to park."

Lannie Zweimiller, director of Lafene, said there will be no access at all through the road into the circle drive, but one emergency vehicle to take patients to the hospital and to transport supplies will be allowed to use an alternate route.

"We are allowed one car for emergencies only," Zweimiller said. "However, as a general rule, there will be no general traffic allowed on that route."

DeBusman said a recommended plan for small emergency vehicles allows them to use the alley between Ward Hall and the Power Plant. Fire truck access will be directed through internal emergency access and the sidewalk system.

DeBusman said work on the access road will be completed by the time classes resume March 27.

"All construction on the access road will be finished by the time students return from break," DeBusman said. "All emergency services have been notified about alternate routes."

Congress examines proposals to stop prison overcrowding

TOPEKA — Some Kansans are trying to revive interest in privately operated prisons as legislators struggle to deal with crowding in the state corrections system.

Legislators are reviewing proposals from two Kansas counties. In each case, a community is working with a private company that would build and operate a new prison, then lease space to the state.

The first proposal is from Butler County, which already has plans to build a new jail for 264 inmates. The county is proposing to build additional housing for between 400 and 500 inmates and let the state use it.

The second proposal is from Yates Center, the seat of Woodson County. It wants to build a prison to hold 500 inmates.

Officials have presented both proposals to the Department of Corrections and outlined them Tuesday for a Senate Ways and Means subcommittee on capital improvements.

They see their proposals as a way to deal with the state's growing inmate population. At the end of February, the state had 8,700 inmates in its custody and space in the corrections system for 8,877, meaning the system was 98 percent full.

Gov. Bill Graves has proposed spending $17.3 million to add space for up to 608 inmates at its maximum-security prison outside El Dorado and at its women's prison in east Topeka.

The subcommittee's chairman, Sen. Dave Kerr, R-Hutchinson, announced that he intends to work on proposals for managing the state's inmate population without new construction.

Sen. Steve Morris, R-Hugoton, a subcommittee member, said if the state needs more space, he is willing to consider private prisons as an option, but added, "There's got to be, I think, some savings there in order to justify going that route."

Having the state lease space in prisons run by private companies is not a new idea. In the past, Simmons has expressed doubts that private companies could operate their prisons as cheaply as the state does, especially if the state expands existing institutions.

But officials from Butler and Woodson counties — and the companies with which they're working — contend their proposals would be less expensive. They also believe they could finish construction before the state.

Butler County would work with Correctional Services Corp. of Sarasota, Fla., which has prisons in Colorado, Missouri and Oklahoma. Yates Center officials are working with GRW Corp., whose vice president of operations is former Corrections Secretary Richard Mills.

Train depot. The old Union Pacific Depot no longer will be.

Gary Fees, city staff member, said their panel recommended it be turned into a meeting and educational center.

Their proposal will be presented later to city commissioners, who then will review it and make a recommendation.

Before reaching their decision, the city panel looked at several choices: turning it into a museum, a 1930s tea room or the United Way headquarters.

"It's a public facility, so the use needs to be a public use," Fees said.

The original building, finished in 1901, was owned by Union Pacific Railroad until it came under city ownership in the 1990s. This is what prompted Mayor Roger Reitz to appoint a city panel that would decide the future of the depot, Fees said.

"It's sitting there in need of use," Fees said.

There are two different grants being used for the depot.

A $279,000 Heritage fund grant is being used to restore some of the depot's structure.

Gay marriage. Citing decades of mistreatment, discrimination and prejudice, the state Legislature's only gay member pleaded Wednesday for support of a bill allowing gays the equivalent of marriage.

Spectators, some wearing pink badges for the bill and others wearing white badges against it, packed the state House as debate began. The measure was introduced in response to a state Supreme Court ruling that gays in Vermont were unconstitutionally denied the rights and benefits of marriage.

Both supporters and opponents say the bill would provide more rights and benefits for same-sex couples than any other state in the country. Backers said they believed they had just enough votes — 76 of 150 — to approve the bill. A final vote by the Democratic-controlled House is expected today.

"If you feel in your heart and soul that this is the right thing to do, remember this is about people and not politics," Democratic leader John Tracy told his colleagues during a party caucus.

Under the bill, gays could be joined by civil unions just as heterosexual couples can marry. They would have the right to dissolve their civil unions through divorces in Family Court.

Study finds Manhattan housing inadequate

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A new housing study is making its way through the Manhattan city government, and some of its advice to the city is simple — get more houses.

In the works since February 1999, "Housing Manhattan: Planning For The Future" is a report compiled by Lincoln, Neb.-based consultants Hanna Keelan Associates, P.C. to advise city officials preparing for housing needs now and up to 2005.

A combination of steering committee discussions, local surveys and statistical data, the study's conclusion is that Manhattan needs more houses across the board to reach its housing potential. Specifically, the draft presented at a Manhattan City Commission planning session last month recommended adding 2,975 units in the next five years.

Of course, that's more of the general target, Tim Keelan said. Keelan, principal partner for Hanna Keelan, said the 2,975 figure was the maximum for Manhattan's potential, not the minimum. Even getting close would benefit the city's residents, he said.

"You have to be pretty good to reach that potential," he said.

The conclusions of the study confirmed what many people already had suspected, Commissioner Karen McCulloh said.

"I don't think there was anything particularly surprising," she said. "It just justifies spending on it."

The effect of such a study, McCulloh said, is that it clearly identifies the need for more and different housing, and it shows the available market to developers.

The latest draft of the study, which Keelan said is under going slight revisions, said Manhattan's year-round vacancy rate is 4 percent, too low for a city like Manhattan, Keelan said.

"You look for anywhere from a 6 to 7-percent vacancy rate," he said.

If that vacancy rate can be raised, it also needs to be raised across the board, Keelan said. Manhattan is a good community, he said, but housing development has not kept up with all sectors of the community.

"You have some upscale housing, but only three housing programs for lower-income elderly," he said.

Senior City Planner Ockert Fourie said vacancy rate refers to new construction as well as the regular buying and selling of houses in an area. Potentially, a low vacancy rate can have an adverse effect on quality and price range.

"In a condition where you don't have vacancy rate, one would have to buy whatever is there," he said. "I think it's a timely exercise of where to focus our efforts."

According to the report, the city would need as much as 445 acres for this expansion. Keelan said that figure might be high, as studies such as this typically multiply the minimum requirements by three to make a safe estimation.

One particular need is more high-density housing such as apartments, townhouses or mobile home parks, he said.

"You need to start looking at land development differently," Keelan said. "Any land that is developed has to be maximized for its potential."

McCulloh said finding enough acreage to develop is the greatest challenge of following the plan.

"I think the one thing I was surprised by was I thought we could do this infill," she said.

Not enough space is available in the heart of the city, she said, which is why the city should look at Miller Ranch.

The Miller Ranch Development, with a residential section estimated at about 170 acres west of Warner Park and near the Arbor Heights neighborhood, might be able to provide the space the city would need, she said.

Then again, it might not, Assistant Director of Planning Eric Cattell said. Miller Ranch is a hilly area and difficult to build upon, which drives the construction cost up, he said. In addition, all the current land is zoned for single family houses.

Housing report recommends inspections of rental properties

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Among its conclusions for the city of Manhattan's housing future, a Lincoln, Neb.-based consultant has suggested the city move to protect its renters.

Referring to its report, "Housing Manhattan: Planning For The Future," which said 58.6 percent of homes studied are rentals, Hanna Keelan Associates, P.C., has the suggested city require rental inspections.

"A need for rental inspections seems to correlate with college towns," said Tim Keelan, principal partner for Hanna Keelan, at the meeting.

Rental inspections for safety-code compliance are not a new idea for Manhattan as a whole or K-State in particular. Leo Prieto, senior in pre-law, modern languages and social science, ran for student body president last year on the issue.

"This is really long awaited," he said. "By making these inspections mandatory, it puts accountability in the hands of the landlords."

Prieto said he hadn't thought about the idea until he studied it for a speech class in November 1998.

He found out the city offered free inspections of apartments, and when he had his checked out, it uncovered violations he didn't even know existed. Things such as no ventilation in bathrooms, copper wiring, low ceilings or enough electrical outlets in rooms all could count as safety violations, he said.

Prieto didn't get the presidency, but he said other students still call him with questions on inspections. The inspections are free, he said, and his own took 10 to 15 minutes. The common fear is that violations mean a letter to the landlord, Prieto said, but part of the landlord's obligation is to fix those problems.

"I know a lot of cases where students just don't know their rights. The only mechanism we have is the phone," he said.

One campus department that deals with rental disputes is Consumer and Tenant Affairs. Andrew McDonnell, director of Consumer and Tenant Affairs, said most students don't bother to inspect the places they rent.

"They just need a place to live," he said. "Very few people will come in before a problem arises. You don't know if it's actually breaking code until there's been an inspection."

Consumer and Tenant Affairs doesn't deal with inspections personally but can refer students where to go with their problems, McDonnell said.

"We'll inform you of your rights as a tenant and try to get you from there," he said.

The place where McDonnell usually refers students is the Code Services Division of city fire services. Brad Claussen, building official for the division, said one of the first steps is to get information on the problem. "One thing we always ask them is, 'Have you contacted the owner?'" he said.

Though the tenant must approve of an inspection and be present, Claussen said owner approval is not required for an inspection, but the division tries to contact the owner as a courtesy. If violations are found, a notice of repair is sent to the owner with deadlines to comply, he said. The deadlines can range from a day or two for something small like a smoke detector that needs batteries up to 180 days for something that might require specialized repairs, he said.

Claussen said inspection time varies by place or number of violations, but a small apartment takes about 30 minutes and a larger house could take 45 minutes to an hour. Claussen said multi-family units, those with three or more apartments, receive annual fire inspections, and newly constructed buildings have construction inspections more strict than code inspections.

Buildings that have passed inspection will bear a compliance sticker with the inspection date, he said, and students living off campus should ask if their property has been inspected.

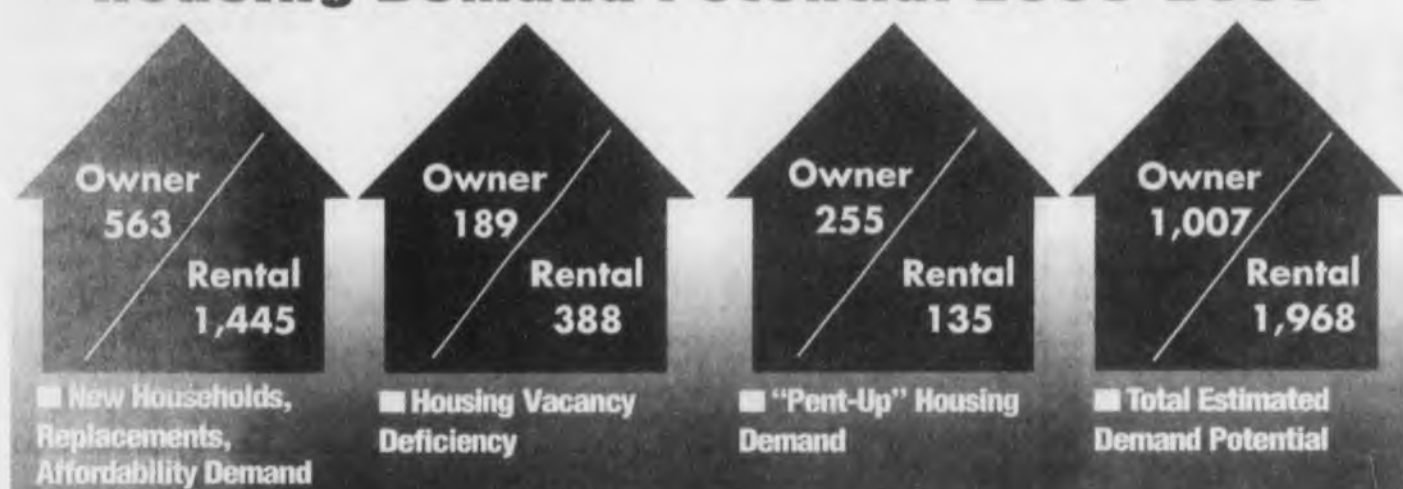

"If you see one of those, that's good," he said.

Claussen said Manhattan had about 11,000 confirmed rental properties in the 1980s, and these numbers certainly have increased since then. At present, Claussen said he has one code inspector, who makes between 300 and 500 inspections a year.

In fact, Claussen said an intern already is planning a study through the city manager's office on Big 12 towns that have implemented mandatory rental inspections.

Even so, such a requirement still would need to decide how to identify rental units and how often to inspect them, he said. Claussen said a good range probably would run between every one to three years, depending on the property.

Student triathlete to represent U.S. in Australia

By CLIF PALMBERG
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One K-Stater has the weight of the United States on her shoulders.

Jill Murphy, graduate student in kinesiology, will be representing the United States in the World Age Group Championship triathlon.

Top athletes from around the globe are meeting April 30 in Perth, Australia, to swim, bike and run for their countries.

Murphy is one of 12 athletes chosen to represent the United States.

"It's kind of cool. This is the biggest race I've been in by far," Murphy said. "I'm not looking for first place, but I want to beat my best time."

The race is divided into age groups, with Murphy competing in the 20- to 24-year-old age group.

Every country that enters athletes can enter 12 athletes in each age category.

Murphy qualified for the race by first placing in the top three at a sanctioned triathlon, which she did in multiple races from Kansas to Louisiana.

That enabled her to compete in the national competition, which takes the top-12 individuals in each age category, making them eligible for the world competition.

Murphy gets most of her support from Sarah and Rick Rosenkranz, both graduate students in kinesiology.

Both Sara and Rick have represented the United States before in the triathlon.

"It is not really an extreme course," Rick Rosenkranz said. "The competition is what is extreme."

At that level you can get boxed around in the swim."

Murphy has been involved in athletics and triathalons at K-State for a while.

While an undergraduate student, Murphy was involved with the women's rowing team.

"In the summer of 1997, I started competing in triathalons," Murphy said. "I was bored of straight training — the variety of training for triathalons is kind of fun."

Murphy has begun intensifying her training for the world championship.

On average, Murphy spends between 21 and 27 hours a week preparing for the event, which includes a 1.5 kilometer swim, a 40 kilometer biking leg and a 10 kilometer run.

Murphy divides her training routine between the three events, with bicycle training lacking a little because of colder weather.

Murphy trains with the KSU Wet Willies swim club three days a week.

"She's a great person," said John Galland, coach and faculty adviser to the swim club.

"She is at practice all the time, is very coachable and very friendly. She is an all around good person."

Infant safety key issue for new legislation

An infant found in a trash bag near Junction City showed the extremes to which desperate young parents will go.

The baby, suffocated and left in a creek, made only one mistake in its short life — being born to two 17-year-old parents.

A new bill in the state Legislature, sponsored by Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, would provide another option for parents who do not want to keep their infants. This bill would allow parents to abandon babies up to 45 days old at hospitals, fire stations or health departments without being charged with child abandonment.

While such legislation certainly could be viewed as providing an easy escape route for irresponsible teen-agers, it is more than that.

It is an escape route for their infants.

Senators already are discussing amending the bill to ensure it is a benefit to society.

They have the backing of both Right to Life and Planned Parenthood, two groups with opposing views on abortion. This array of support reveals that, regardless of views on abortion, preserving the lives of newborns is a top priority.

Senators need to do all they can to improve this bill, but they should do so quickly. Teen-agers, acting out of fear and ignorance, often are willing to do anything to escape the burden imposed upon them by a child.

While it is not the state's responsibility to raise everyone's children for them, it is their responsibility to ensure those children are protected from their own parents.

To those of you who viewed the Amnesty International presentation: How many of you could point to Tibet on a map?

I was wondering if this means we can't dog on Asbury any more.

Tom, you did a good job.

I can't believe we made a $2 million decision with only one interview. Maybe our problem is Max Urlick and not Tom Asbury.

We don't need any more columns about greys or any more columns about religion. We need more articles about squirrels.

Is Dana Pracht single? Just wanted to know.

I think it's nice that the campaign you ran with real students didn't win. Good job, K-State. Thanks for voting.

I want to know what the hell is going on at Fort Riley that they're bombing at 12:30 in the morning.

What is all that junk around the Forum? Oh, yeah. That's the Collegian.

Gas is 12 cents cheaper five minutes outside of town on Highway 24.

Repeat after me: all generalizations are false.

You drink with us at the bars, you sit next to us in class. But you won't come out and support us unless we have a winning record. I'm embarrassed, too, just for the fact that I'm on the basketball team — not because of our record, but because our own student body won't support us.

I just punched Scott Roney in the head, and it felt damn good.

Thank you Jeff Elliott for, by far, the worst column ever in the history of the Collegian.

Did anybody else notice that after the Worcester and Pracht victory was announced, the bombs from Riley seemed to be a lot closer?

Coach Wooldridge is bringing the triple-post offense back to K-State. Cats — national champions in 2003.

It would be really sweet if Fort Riley could quit bombing. Aren't we at peace right now?

DON'T DENY THE TRUTH

God made world through EVOLUTION workings of nature, not so much to glorify God, but as a means to better understand him.

Being that God has made himself scarce since Jesus was nailed to the cross, what better way to understand the creator (besides reading the Bible) than through a clear and accurate understanding of his creation?

It's one thing to say, "Isn't it nice that God made the grass green?" It's more amazing to realize the reason grass is green is not because God felt it was more feng-shui than making the grass mauve, but because plants contain a green pigment, chlorophyll, and through this chemical, plants can utilize the light energy emitted by the sun to convert carbon dioxide and water into sugars that then can be a source of energy for the multitudes of non-photosynthesizing organisms.

Likewise, it's one thing to say, "Isn't it nice God made all living organisms?" It's even more amazing to realize all of these living organisms can adapt and evolve to ever-changing conditions in order to survive.

The reason scientists make a big deal about the study of evolution is not to undermine Christianity and convert people to Satanism, but because 1) it's the truth, and 2) it's the unifying — and most important — theory in life science.

Nothing in biology makes any sense outside the theory of evolution. Without evolution, all biology is a collection of disparate areas of study. Through the theory of evolution that we can link anatomy with ecology, physiology with behavior, biochemistry with morphology. It's through evolution all these studies become linked and new insights can be revealed that could not be revealed without evolution.

A simple example would be why do humans get goosebumps when we're cold or scared? Humans mostly are hairless, so goosebumps really don't do anything like it does for the hairier primates by creating a pocket of warm air when cold or make the animal appear larger when threatened.

As Roney alluded to, one clearly cannot understand a system from a viewpoint within the system. Just as a study of planetary motion from the vantage point of being on Earth results in observations in which the planets do erratic loop-the-loops across the night sky and only from a vantage point outside the solar system does it become clear the planets move elliptically around the sun, a clear understanding of human nature only can be achieved from a vantage point outside of humanity.

Evolution provides this vantage point. Through evolution we realize humans are not separate from nature but a part of it. Evolution allows us to study humanity from the greater context of being a living organism. From this viewpoint, realities about humans become clear which have, in the past, been muddled.

An example would be racism. As I stated last week, through the study of evolution, all variation among human beings is superficial to their worth. The theory of evolution demonstrates racism has no foundation in science. This truth derived from evolutionary theory has done more to eradicate racism in the 140 years since the publication of the "The Origin of Species" than 2,000 years of Christianity.

In fact, at the time "The Origin of Species" was published, Christian theology had culminated in two schools of thought about race. The European school believed in monogeny degeneration, which stated that, because of original sin, man has fallen from God, with darker skinned people falling further than lighter skinned people. The American school believed in polygeny, which stated the various races actually are different species, with the white species being the best.

Roney asks what our religious scientific forefathers would think of statements like humans are related to worms (we're also separate from nature and thus not affected by it. That's how he arrives at such nonsense as he did last semester that the best thing for humanity is to produce as many offspring as possible regardless of the fact that it will completely destroy the environment and subsequently ourselves (as has been shown to be true with many other living organisms whose populations have grown beyond that which its ecological niche could support).

Evolution shows us humans are a part of nature and this humbles us. We know if we screw up our environment, we're only screwing ourselves.

There are thousands upon thousands of scientists with Ph.Ds who work at all the world's most illustrious scientific institutions who have and are continuing to produce multitudes of volumes of research, all of which support the theory of evolution. Science builds upon the discoveries of others. If the foundation of evolution were fallacious, this line of inquiry would have ended a long time ago.

With all science has produced to the great benefit of mankind, how can anybody's mind be so muddled as to believe all these scientists studying evolution are deluded?

Assuming God exists and he desires for humans to know the truth, the fact that Roney claims his beliefs tell him evolution does not occur in the face of overwhelming evidence demonstrates that it does, means his beliefs are not based on God's words but on the ideas of man. Thus, Roney's beliefs are nothing more than secular humanism.

If God is the creator of the universe, he created one in which evolution occurs. To deny this aspect of his creation is to deny God's greater glory.

David Levin is a graduate student in entomology. You can e-mail him at bugs@ksu.edu.

KELLIE FARRELL/Collegian

related to eagles, and butterflies and giant sequoias), evolution is random and undirected, without plan nor purpose (evolution might be random, but it has direction and purpose) or evolution attributes biological diversity to natural, not supernatural, causes.

Actually, it is irrelevant what anybody thinks. The vast preponderance of scientific evidence supports the fact evolution occurs regardless of what Newton would have thought (Just as it was irrelevant the Church once believed in a geocentric solar system, it doesn't change the reality of heliocentricity).

Roney's beliefs give man a false inflated self-esteem, and one in which man is

Students should welcome proposed legislations that would give young parents more alternatives

The blustery wind did little to chill the bodies of two hunters last November outside of Junction City.

They were too horrified by the baby they found wrapped in a trash bag lying in a creek.

The teen-age mother, who confessed with the baby's father to suffocating the body, is serving a four-year sentence.

Both the mother and father are repentant for their actions.

Desperation, an ignorant desperation, led them down the road to death.

In our society, the infrastructure exists for children to find solutions for their pregnancies before ending a life.

Social Rehabilitation Services, churches, adoption agencies and — let us not forget — the couple's parents.

Any number of answers could have been found, but for an unknown reason, they all failed.

That failure has led to the proposition of a bill by Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan.

The bill will allow parents to drop off newborns younger than 45 days old at hospitals, fire stations and health departments.

If the child has not suffered abuse, the parents will be free to go. The baby then would be turned over to the SRS to begin the process of terminating the parents' rights.

At first repulsed by the legislation, I now see its value.

If it saves one child from a horrible death and one set of parents from desperation so great they consider killing their own child, it has worth.

My first response came from my belief that life is precious.

I couldn't imagine hurting a child.

Yet, the world is not a perfect place and we need the legislation, even if it is unsettling.

Opponents of the bill say a bigger issue needs to be addressed. Some say this legislation only covers up a situation that is far more desperate.

No one will disagree with them that this is a small solution to a bigger problem.

The real issue is a lack of responsibility and selfishness. These parents and parents like them who neglect and abuse their children do not deserve the right and privilege to raise them.

There are countless numbers of couples who can provide a loving and nurturing home and yet cannot have babies.

The babies turned over under this bill will live better lives because of it.

While I do not discount the need to focus on the deeper wound, at some point something must be done to lessen the pain and suffering.

If this bill is the balm needed to save at least one child, it is worth its costs and ramifications until we can solve the deeper issues.

I encourage all of you to call your senators and representatives in its support.

The baby in Junction City did not receive a fair chance at life. We cannot let this tragic event take place again.

As Oleen said, "We shouldn't be pointing fingers of guilt, but giving a helping hand."

Column's inaccuracies, biases offend instructor

Editor,

I hate to say this, but I think that Scott Roney finally has lost it.

Before we begin, I realize I'm responding to a column and that Roney deliberately is omitting much of history in order to fit science into his worldview.

It would be more prudent, I think, to remove Roney and insert segments of the Bible publicly, so we all could read what Roney is supporting directly, thus truly equating the knowledge of the readers with that of the didacts.

It needs to be pointed out that Roney seems to believe that by stating something, it becomes true. Roney, do you really believe Christianity is the first religion to claim people are real? Furthermore, all of the teachings you refer to in your column ("that God is both Creator and Lawgiver") certainly aren't confined to Christianity — all of them came from Judaism, which is thousands of years older than Christianity.

Roney, I found your column offensive. You have slighted my culture. While you write "Eastern culture [had taught] the physical world is an illusion," Eastern scholars had discarded this idea centuries before it even entered Western thought. By not mentioning the scientific development of the East, you have implied this development never occurred. Clear evidence of the development of the East can be seen in navigation. For example, many navigational instruments, as well as almost all of the theory of navigation, were created by the Arabs.

The science of optics — up to the laser — was developed by a certain Muslim scholar, Hassan Ibn Al-Haytham.

Algebra, number theory and geometry were developed nearly completely by another Muslim scholar, Al-Khwarizmi. He was, in fact, so famous for his work that the word algorithm comes from his name.

Eastern science was so much more advanced than western science that for almost a century after Europe emerged from the Dark Ages, all textbooks were written in Arabic. Thus, your statement that "what we know as modern science actually grew out of a Christian worldview" simply is hogwash.

In addition, your references are faulty. You claim Blaise Pascal was the inventor of the first calculator, neglecting the abacus. Alarming, you claim James Maxwell invented the laws of electromagnetism — this is analogous to saying Benjamin Franklin invented lightning. Let's point out that science only deals with the material world, that to extend science to the supernatural is not presently possible. You write, "Naturalism is not science [because] it is a philosophy that flatly denies both the supernatural and the existence of anything beyond the material world," also while writing "Western thinkers ... value the study of nature."

In passing, you also have managed to leave out the science of the Greeks. Although they were part of the West, they were in no way Christian.

In summary, your column has offended my colleagues and I by denying the truth and suggesting that non-Christians should not be studying science, since it is the "Christian worldview" that prompts the proper scientific study of nature, whereas the majority of modern science was the work of non-Christians who obviously failed to carry this worldview.

I hope you stop writing and start thinking soon.

New group focuses on environment

By KELLY EVENSON
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Make a difference by helping the environment.

A new student group at K-State is making this part of its mission statement as it begins to gain ground in the community.

The Students for Environmental Action's purpose is to educate the local community and the campus about environmental issues and to offer a kind of grass roots activism to find solutions, said Amy Dix, organizer of Students for Environmental Action and junior in biochemistry.

"This is something that many people are interested in," Dix said. "A lot of people don't become involved in helping the environment because they don't have the ways or means to become active."

Dix said the group is trying to reorganize its mission statement, but also is coming up with projects its members can do to make the community aware of the environment and the organization.

"This is an opportunity for people to help the environment and have a means to act on their feelings," Dix said. "We all know what to do, but this is a way to get an idea and push it forward until it gets done."

Ben Champion, junior in chemistry and natural resources and environmental sciences, said he thinks the group is important because the quality of the environment is crucial to everyone.

"I consider this group essential because the environment is very fragile and is important to everyone's well-being," Champion said. "We don't exactly have a right to be a dominating force and try to violate nature. We need to keep that in mind in our daily lives."

Dix said Students for Environmental Action is planning on doing several projects in the next couple of months, including collecting all the trash from one building and placing it in a central location. She said volunteers then will separate all of the recyclable material from it to demonstrate how much is wasted by throwing some products in the trash.

Another of the group's ideas is to assist in an Earth Day celebration. Dix said Students for Environmental Action will have a booth at Sunset Zoological Park in April that will have environmental information available.

"We want to have activities that involve recycling and environmental issues to try to educate the public," Dix said. "We are going to have kids make paper, plant a seed and other things to show what they can do to be conscience of their surroundings."

Champion also said in the upcoming semesters, Students for Environmental Action will try to get guest speakers to come in to talk about environmental issues. He also said the group will be working with the environmental professional group and the university recycling committee to promote projects.

"I think this organization has the capability to become very popular," Champion said. "I think people at the university have more of an educated outlook on life and can see the value of the environment. They then will be more willing to preserve it."

Dix said K-State is one of the few schools in the United States that does not have an established recycling effort. She also said neither the organization nor the recycling program on campus has an exclusive budget.

What money the programs have comes from the waste management budget. Dix said if that is depleted, which has happened in the past, the recycling effort is finished.

Recently, a budget request was passed through city/university funding to allocate more money to the K-State recycling program, raising its budget by $48,000.

"We need to get some money established that not just comes from a grant," Dix said. "Other universities donate $1 per student for their recycling effort. I think people would be willing to pay just a small sum of money for a good cause."

Dix said students should become involved in helping the environment because it is an easy way to do something good and give a little back to the environment.

"Each week, we get more and more people to come to the meetings," Dix said. "It seems like there is a student interest out there because so many people want to help the environment. This group gives us a way to educate the campus and the community about what they can do to help with our cause."

Students for Environmental Action meets at 9:15 p.m. Thursday nights in the K-State Student Union.

Wildcats capture group, individual titles at National Junior Division debate tournament

By LINDA BYRD
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The National Junior Division debate tournament left K-State debaters tired and cranky at its conclusion Monday night, debate coach Sue Stanfield said.

Although the tournament started Saturday and ended Monday evening, making it a tiresome event for the 29 debate teams that participated from 13 different colleges, the Wildcats captured a victory for the second straight year.

Michael Shultz, freshman in speech, and Alex Garrett, freshman in economics, argued about the United States' economic sanctions with Cuba, Iran, Iraq, Syria and North Korea, debating their way to a 7-1 record in preliminary rounds.

They proceeded to win four single-elimination rounds and were named the national champions.

Shultz also was the top speaker at the tournament.

Other K-State teams turned in strong performances at the tournament.

Sophomores Melissa Newton and Michelle Roddy tied freshman Ben Sharp and sophomore Kyle Wilson for 5th place with preliminary round records of 6-2, and freshmen Justin Meier and Tyler Tighe tied for 9th after a preliminary record of 4-4.

"We like beating Johnson County. We beat KU in the sixth round and KU likes to talk a lot of smack, so we put them in their place," Garrett said. "The win proves hard work pays off."

Traditionally, the tournament takes place in Kansas City area but was moved to the K-State campus this year because the national varsity championship will be hosted in Kansas City area next weekend. Shultz and Garrett, along with three other Wildcat teams, will be competing in this championship.

John Burtis, associate professor and director of forensics, said debate tournaments allow for the judging of student's public policy debates.

"The debates are similar to the presidential debates but are much better," Burtis said. "They are better because they are concentrated on one subject and the debate teams and coaches research all year to build strong arguments."

Members of the debate squad agree that every win reflects the strength of teamwork, not just in the tournaments, but throughout the entire season, and that teamwork is crucial to the debate squad's success.

"Sue has been helpful meeting our educational needs and is concerned about our overall well-being," Garrett said. "The assistants provide us with a lot of research and help."

"The debates are similar to the presidential debates but are much better"

Royals await MLB approval of new owner

By JOHN MILBURN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — David Glass remembers when Ewing Kauffman envisioned finding a new owner for the Kansas City Royals. Now, Glass stands as the club's choice to take control of the team.

The former president and CEO of Wal-Mart Inc. said he had expressed interest in the team to his friend before Kauffman died in 1993, but he was cautioned against ownership then. The sage owner foresaw the problems looming in baseball with players, management and the escalating salaries.

Kauffman knew the right time would come, Glass said after the acceptance of his bid, subject to approval by Major League Baseball, was announced Tuesday by the Royals' board. And Glass, who became chairman after Kauffman's death, said he believes that time is now.

Glass, 64, a self-described baseball junkie, grew up a Cardinals fan in Mountain View, Mo. He started taking his children to spring training as soon as they were able to walk.

"They know this is something I wanted to do, and they're excited about it, too," Glass said. "I don't see this as David Glass buying the Royals. It's my family buying the Royals."

Looking ahead, if the sale is approved by major league baseball, Glass said the succession plan would provide for his son Dan and other family members to assume ownership.

Glass said his interest in Kansas City baseball was piqued in the 1970s, particularly in 1977, when the Royals were a dominant team in the American League. With the current solid position players and young pitching in the organization, he said he sees the team regaining that stature and competing in the league.

But to do so, Glass said, he would not be prone to going the free-agent route, inflating the team's payroll to produce an immediate winner.

However, he did not rule out dabbling in the market if the Royals needed a key player late to compete for a wildcard or division title.

"I despise losing," he said. "Just because you are in a small market demographically doesn't mean you can't field a competitive team."

Glass talked about the Royals creating a family atmosphere at the 28-year-old Kauffman Stadium. This season, new blue seats were installed and a picnic pavilion is under construction beyond the left field wall.

"We don't need a new stadium," Glass said. "But all the amenities in the world is no substitute for having an exciting team down on the field."

"I could sit there and eat the best hot dog I've ever had, but if they play lousy and lose every game, I'm not going to like it."

Wildcats defeat Tigers 7-2, improve record to 2-0 in Big 12 Conference

By DEREK BOSS
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Avenge a 7-2 loss to Missouri in Columbia last year, the K-State women's tennis squad defeated the Tigers 7-2 Wednesday at Ahearn Field House in Manhattan.

Missouri's victory last spring snapped K-State's streak of 13 consecutive wins in the series.

"I'm not sure how much a factor last year was," Wildcat head coach Steve Bietau said. "That was a very painful loss."

"Actually, at the time that it happened, it didn't carry the meaning that it did later on. It became pretty clear what the mistakes were."

K-State (7-4) rectified those mistakes and improved to an undefeated 2-0 record in the Big 12 Conference, while the Tigers (3-10) dropped to 1-6.

"It's important that we beat Missouri, and it's important that we're 2-0," freshman Petra Sedlmajerova said. "Doubles was very good — we played very aggressive."

Due to the Big 12 format, singles are played first in conference games, followed by the doubles matches.

K-State made its presence known early, jumping out to a 3-0 lead in singles play with wins at No. 1, No. 2 and No. 4.

At No. 1, Sedlmajerova improved to 11-0 on the season, defeating freshman Marina Zelenovic, 6-0, 6-3.

Tied at two in the second set, Sedlmajerova won four of the next five games to claim the victory.

Junior Eva Novotna followed at No. 2 with a 6-3, 6-1, win over Joni Jordan, and sophomore Alena Jecminkova topped junior Andrea Friedman, 6-0, 6-1.

"Alena played some dominant tennis in singles and doubles," Bietau said.

At No. 3 singles, junior Anna Pampoulova dropped the match to freshman Kristina Olshanskaya, 6-4, 6-3.

Despite the loss, Bietau said the junior didn't play a single bad match — she simply lost to a tough player.

The Cats then split at No. 5 and 6 singles, with sophomore Kathy Chuda defeating Caitlin Thompson, 6-2, 6-2, and junior Natalia Farmer falling to Jelena Kocergin, 6-1, 6-1.

However, it was the doubles competition that set K-State apart from the Tigers. The Cats swept doubles 3-0.

"Overall, it was probably the best doubles performance this season," Bietau said.

"Missouri seemed to let down as the day went on. But we had dominant doubles, and I was really pleased with that."

The tandem of Pampoulova/Jecminkova set the stage with a 8-0 shutout at No. 2 doubles over the Tigers' Friedman and Julie Thomas.

Sedlmajerova and Novotna ensured by winning the first four games en route to a 8-2 victory against Zelenovic/Thompson.

Chuda and Farmer followed suit, jumping out to a 7-0 lead before taking the match, 8-1, over Olshanskaya and Jordan.

Up next, K-State will play the second match of its two-game homestand at 10 a.m. Saturday against Baylor. The Bears (12-0) sit undefeated with a conference record of 5-0.

EVAN SEMON/COLLEGIAN

Freshman K-State women's No. 1 singles player Petra Sedlmajerova sets up for a return against Missouri in Wednesday afternoon's match in Ahearn Field House. Sedlmajerova moved to a perfect 10-0 this spring.

Cinderella stories give NCAA Tournament appeal

You've gotta love March Madness.

Skipping class to watch the afternoon games, losing lots of money in the three tournament pools you entered and, last but not least, cheering for that Cinderella team—a team whose chances literally seem as bleak and hopeless as a Collegian sports writer trying to get an answer out of Athletic Director Max Urlick.

During the NCAA Tournament, there's something inside you that emanates a drive, a passion, an obligation to root for that 16th seed (even though you've probably never heard of the school or have a remote idea of what part of the country it's in).

It's a baffling phenomenon, but it's inside every true sports fan. I'm already starting to feel the magic of March Madness. I admit, for some reason it's not as strong as in years past, but it's still there.

So, to go out on a limb, I'm going to give you the breakdown on how this year's NCAA Tournament will play out:

■ In the Midwest, Michigan State (26-7) simply is unstoppable. Step back, Valparaiso, your postseason magic is all used up.

The Spartans are the most feared team in the nation, and with the experience they gained from reaching the Final Four last year, they look to be the team to beat.

Michigan State has won nine of its past 10 games, and with the backcourt combination of Charlie Bell and Mateen Cleaves, complimented by co-Big Ten Player of the Year Morris Peterson, the Spartans are my pick in the Midwest to reach the Final Four. Their only roadblock looks to be a potential Iowa State matchup in the Elite Eight.

Speaking of the Cyclones (29-4), the Big 12 Conference champion should have an easy road until they face Michigan State. Iowa State has the most wins among the 64-team field, led by the unanimous Big 12 Player of the Year selection Marcus Fizer, who's averaging more than 30 points in his past eight games.

The Midwest should have a few upsets to keep an eye on. Seventh-seed Auburn, minus All-American Chris Porter, likely will collapse at the hands of former K-State head coach Dana Altman's Creighton Bluejays.

Saint Louis, after a stunning victory over then-No. 1 Cincinnati, will ride its momentum over Rick Majerus, who never has lost a first-round contest at Utah. Then, in the second round, look for UCLA, fresh off an eventual return of JaRon Rush, to down third-seed Maryland to earn a date with Iowa State in the Sweet 16. Also pay attention to Jamaal Magloire as he takes the Kentucky Wildcats to victory over a hot Syracuse squad.

In the East, Duke (27-4) will win out, with its only competition lying in a potential pairing with former K-State head coach Lon Kruger and his Illinois Fighting Illini. No. 2-seed Temple likely will find its way into the Sweet 16, but Eddie Sutton's Oklahoma State squad will fend off the Owls from advancing any further.

The East will be full of upsets. A 12-seed has beaten a five seed at least once every year since 1988.

That streak will continue, as Butler very well could surprise Florida in the first round.

I also pick DePaul to defeat a lack-luster Kansas Jayhawk squad, while one of my sleepers — Pepperdine — will stun Bobby Knight and his "NCAA tradition" at Indiana. In addition, 10th-seed Seton Hall should top Oregon in first round action.

■ In the West, Arizona (26-6) will meet St. John's (24-7) in the Elite Eight, and the Redmen will advance to the Final Four as a No. 2 seed. St. John's Erick Barkley should play, but I think the Redmen are good enough to play well without his dominating presence.

Gonzaga will upset Louisville in the first round but won't make a tournament run like last season. Two Big 12 teams, Texas and Oklahoma, will advance to the Sweet 16 but will prove no match for 'Zona and St. John's, respectively, and won't reach the Elite Eight.

Two of my other sleeper teams in the first round are in the West. Fresno State will top Wisconsin and play Arizona close, but not close enough to vault them into the Sweet 16. My other surprise lies in 11th-seed Dayton.

The Flyers have the perimeter shooting to get past former K-Stater Gene Keady and Purdue.

■ In the South, Stanford (26-3) will get past the Big 12's Missouri Tigers in the second round, followed by Tennessee in the Sweet 16, but the Cardinals will find disappointment when they meet No. 3-seed Ohio State in the Elite 8.

I know Stanford statistically ranks as one of the top teams in the nation, but I just can't allow myself to put a team from the Pac-10 in the Final Four. What can I say?

Ohio State (22-6) and the tandem of Scoonie Penn and Michael Redd will annihilate the Kenyon Martin-less Cincinnati Bearcats to propel them to Indianapolis.

Watch for another 12th-seed to pull an upset in the South, with Utah State pulling the surprise on defending national champion Connecticut. No. 11 Arkansas also is one of my sleepers. The Razorbacks will get past Miami (Fla.), but will prove no match for the Buckeyes.

■ In the Final Four, Duke and Michigan State no doubt will meet for the title. Bet on the Blue Devils' experience and three-point shooting to provide the edge in Indianapolis.

In any event, this year's NCAA Tournament will provide some magic for college basketball fans.

Besides, those are the true memories that make up March Madness.

New course will provide home, improved facilities for KSU golf

By RICHARD SMITH
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Golf enthusiasts across central Kansas finally will have a chance to see how they measure up to the big boys when the Colbert Hills Golf Course opens in early May.

The challenging course, designed by Jeff Brauer of Golfscape with input from PGA Tour veteran and K-State alumnus Jim Colbert, will be unlike anything available to area golfers, K-State athletics director, Max Urlick, said.

"It's such an asset to have a golf course of this quality here in Manhattan," Urlick said. "This is a world-class course. It will attract people from all over the country and possibly the world to come here and play. It's a unique setting."

The opening of this top-notch course will be accompanied by a week of elaborate grand-opening events. The official dedication of the course, the Earl Woods National Youth Golf Academy and the Ron Fogler Recognition Monument will come May 1 at an invitation-only ceremony.

Highlights of the week will include a Pro-Am tournament for selected donors, featuring Colbert, Lee Trevino, Annika Sorenstam and others on Monday, the public opening of the "Dear Friends: Views of the American West" exhibit at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art on Tuesday, and days set aside for alumni, campus groups and the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce later in the week.

The first day the course will be completely open for public tee times will be May 6. Tee times can be arranged by calling 776-6475.

VIPs and local golf junkies aren't the only ones who will reap the benefits of the state-of-the-art course. Once opened, Colbert Hills Golf Course also will serve as home course for the K-State men's and women's golf teams.

The two teams now rotate among area courses such as Stagg Hill Golf Club and the Manhattan Country Club for practice, and they play all of their tournaments away from home.

Women's coach Kristi Knight said the Colbert Hills Golf Course would provide her with teaching tools she hasn't had in the past.

"Basic things like having a grass driving range to hit balls off of year-round," Knight said. "We're going to have chipping areas and large practice putting greens. The nine-hole, par-three teaching course ... is going to be ideal for practicing the short game and in the scoring zone."

"The practice facilities there are going to be better than anything the men's and women's golf teams have ever had to work with."

Knight also said being able to show off Colbert Hills Golf Course to future recruits will be a tremendous boost in her efforts to lure top golfing talent to Manhattan.

"It will help us recruiting-wise because there are several schools in the Big 12 that have their own facilities," Knight said. "Most of your good junior players are looking for a good golf course to play on during their college years, and a good practice facility. It's very important."

Men's coach Tim Norris said the difficult course will better prepare them for tournament play, both in Manhattan and out of town.

"Everything else is going to look easier after playing Colbert Hills," Norris said.

"That can only make your team better. The training conditions, the practice conditions we face here are as challenging as they're going to be. When we go to a tournament, that's going to pay big dividends."

Road trips can lead to unhealthy eating choices

Classes are over for the week. The suitcases are packed. The route is highlighted on the map. A selection of music to last the entire road trip has been chosen.

You're getting out of here, but not without a cooler full of food.

A necessity for many students on spring break is food. Snacks almost are inevitable on a road trip, said Dianna Schalles, director of nutrition services at Lafene Health Center.

"Students on a tight budget don't want to stop at a restaurant, so snacking is very popular," Schalles said.

Even though there will be the urge to snack, she said travelers should try to stick as close as possible to a regular meal plan.

"I do recommend people don't munch all day long," she said. "They should try to reject the vacation mentality, the throw-all-caution-to-the-wind mentality, and try to stick to balanced meals."

Schalles said if people are going to take food on a road trip, they should stick to healthier foods such as popcorn, yogurt, fresh fruit and raw vegetables.

instead of candy bars and potato chips. Travis Pettegrew, salesman at The Pathfinder, said items such as summer sausage, granola bars and crackers also are good snack choices.

"Foods that are low-maintenance or don't take a lot to make are good to take along on trips," Pettegrew, freshman in open-option, said. "Another good food idea is items that you just add water to, like oatmeal."

Schalles said deli meats for sandwiches also are popular on road trips, but it's important to keep them in a cooler.

"Any sort of meat or mayo or egg-based food needs to be kept cold," she said. "It's necessary to keep those foods in a cooler stocked with ice."

Once the cooler is filled with ice, Schalles said it's important to remember to keep it filled once the ice begins to melt.

"The cooler is like a fridge," she said. "You don't want to keep the fridge unplugged and you don't want to run out of ice in the cooler."

The types of foods taken could depend on the type of trip being taken, Schalles said.

"Skiing takes a lot of extra calories," she said. "Foods like dried fruit and nut mixes or high in carbohydrates are good for extra energy."

Angie Lickteig, sophomore in biology, said she is planning to take snacks on her Colorado skiing trip next week.

"I don't know what I'm taking yet," Lickteig said. "But we usually have granola bars and Crunch 'N' Munch."

Kris Gafford, senior in advertising, said she has taken food on spring break road trips before.

"We tried to take food that didn't need to be refrigerated, like beef jerky and crackers," Gafford said. "Taking our own food was cheaper than eating in a restaurant, and then we also had food there in the hotel room."

Even though she doesn't plan ahead, Anne Snyder, senior in elementary education, said she always has some sort of food when she's traveling.

"We usually buy as we go," Snyder said. "We'll stop to get gas and buy lunches to put in a cooler so we won't have to buy lunch later."

She said she usually gets items like sandwiches, fruit, chips and pop.

Traditional meals commemorate Irish holiday

By REED DUNN
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Americans tend to dye everything green to celebrate the Irish-based holiday, St. Patrick's Day.

Brian Grove, assistant director and executive chef at the K-State Student Union, said Irish people observe the day for religious reasons.

"In Ireland, it tends to be a lot more of a religious and folk holiday," he said. "Green has become the color in this country we add to identify with the Irish."

Corned beef and cabbage is the meal that traditionally is served in America in celebration of the March 17 holiday, Grove said.

"I think it's one that's very traditional," he said. "I think it's one the American public identifies with."

All this week, the Union Food Court has been serving corned beef and cabbage, Irish beef stew and corned beef on rye sandwiches. Grove said they also have cupcakes decorated with shamrocks and green icing.

Grove said that in Ireland, stews are a popular meal. He said they often use beef, corned beef and even wild game in their stews.

"The Irish have always been very thrifty people," he said. "The stew idea is very popular and very traditional. Irish cooking tends to use a lot of roasted meats with potatoes."

Although not popular in the Midwest, Grove said roasted leg of lamb and mutton are Irish foods often eaten in America.

Cathy Nutter, assistant manager at Elements of Taste, said the restaurant will be serving corned beef this weekend as part of the Aggieville St. Patrick's Day celebration.

"We are having a special with corned beef and mashed potatoes," she said. "We are also going to have a grill set up outside, and we'll have a ribeye sandwich special."

Chau Chappell, general manager at Mini's Diner, said they are trying something different to attract the public. He said they will be serving corned beef and cabbage during the day, but they will serve breakfast Dr. Seuss-style.

"We'll be having green eggs and ham in the morning," he said. "It's just something we thought we'd try because it's St. Patrick's Day."

Irish Porter Beef
Servings: 4
2 lb. rib steak
1 1/2 lb. onions
1/2 lb. mushrooms
Seasoned flour
10 fl. oz. Guinness or other stout
10 fl. oz. Stock or water
Pinch of nutmeg
Salt and pepper
Fat for frying

Cut meat into fairly large chunks and roll in seasoned flour. Brown in hot fat and remove from pot. Chop onions roughly and fry gently for 2-3 minutes. Return meat to pot. Add all other ingredients. Bring to the boil, reduce heat and simmer gently for 2 hours or until meat is tender.

Irish Cheesecake

1 cup graham-cracker crumbs
1/4 cup sugar
1/4 cup margarine, melted
1 envelope unflavored gelatin
1/2 cup cold water
1 cup sugar
3 large eggs, separated
16 oz. cream cheese, softened
2 tablespoon cocoa
2 tablespoon bourbon
1 cup whipping cream, whipped

Combine graham-cracker crumbs, sugar and margarine; press onto bottom of 9-inch springform pan. Soften gelatin in water, stir over low heat until dissolved. Blend in 3/4 cup sugar and beaten egg yolks; cook stirring constantly, over low heat, 3 minutes.

Combine cream cheese and cocoa, mixing at medium speed on electric mixer until well blended. Gradually add gelatin mixture and bourbon, mixing until well blended.

Chill until thickened but not set. Beat egg whites until foamy; gradually adding the remaining sugar, beating until stiff peaks form. Fold egg whites and whipped cream into cheese mixture and pour over crust. Chill until firm. Garnish with chocolate curls and small silver candy balls, if desired. Variation: Substitute 2 tablespoons cold coffee for bourbon.

VOLUNTEERS

When they volunteer, sometimes students come face-to-face with challenges such as poverty, violence and mental illness, Morgan said.

"For some students, those experiences are what volunteering is all about and they love it," she said. "Yet others may prefer to file papers or stack boxes when they volunteer. Experiences are available at both ends of the spectrum."

This range of opportunities allows students who volunteer to become more well-rounded, Stafford said.

Volunteering makes students appreciate what they have and what they have to give others. She said it also made Stafford discover other talents in her life.

"My career path has changed since I started volunteering," she said. "It's been a self-exploration time for me. I used to think I wanted to work in an office all day. Now, I know I want to work with children."

Barrett said students who volunteer go on to be the most successful in their career fields because they understand people and themselves better.

Stafford said the rewards were worth the trouble.

"I understand why people don't want to volunteer," Stafford said. "It is a big sacrifice. But what a reward it is. You really do gain as much as you give."

Officials from the National Transportation Safety Board were to arrive at 9:30 a.m. to begin searching for the cause of the derailment.

The train's passengers were evacuated by members of the local emergency response teams, the highway patrol and the Topeka Police Department.

Searchlights from highway patrol and police helicopters helped rescuers see their way to the scene of the accident, in the middle of a field.

"This was a very rural setting," Ikehorn said. "These people had to go through farm fields and the process of walking through mud to get to the train."

Members of the response team had to use ladders to scale the train and reach the windows to evacuate passengers.

The passengers were taken by school bus to the Carbondale grade school, Ikehorn said. They later were removed to lodging facilities in Topeka.

Crews from Kansas City, Mo., and Abilene were on hand by 7 a.m. to help authorities move the cars.

Forsberg said the removal of some of the cars would not hinder the NTSB's investigation into the cause of the accident.

Ikehorn said all involved handled the situation well.

"For an incident that happened in the middle of the night, we had a fantastic, multifaceted response," he said.

HOUSING

"There's a lot of land up there, but it may not be developable land," he said. "I'm not sure that Miller Ranch and the area to Scenic Drive will be the only area where new houses would go."

Other options, he said, would include the Northview neighborhood near Eisenhower Middle School or the Grand Mere Development on the northwest edge of the city, which just successfully passed its development master plan through the commission last week.

Adding high-density housing also brings in the challenge of finding contractors. Housing is market-driven, Keelan said. When it is more profitable to build a high-income single family house, incentives such as interest loans are needed to show contractors they can make a profit building duplexes, he said.

Cattell said whether or not the local developers were interested in building high-density dwellings, the sheer number probably is more than they could build within five years. Recruiting outside Manhattan would be likely, he said.

For that, Keelan said the city needs to establish a Community Housing Development Organization. The organization is a separate corporation, independent of the city, that oversees housing issues, something of a reincarnation of the housing study's steering committee.

Commissioner Carol Peak already has expressed interest in creating a CHDO for Manhattan. The institution, a non-profit group certified by the Kansas Department of Commerce and Housing, could be a gateway to the grants developers need to turn profits on high-density housing.

"My whole interest in this thing is affordable housing," she said. "We need to think of economic development as more than job creation."

For the future, it is hoped the steering committee's next meeting in early April will begin steps toward the plan being passed by the commission in May or June, Fourie said. For now, Keelan said, the housing five-year action plan, set to debut in April as well, will be structured as a calendar of events on how to achieve the consultants' suggestions.

"The action plan will be the real heart and soul of it," he said.

Ethnic Albanians warned about cross-border raids

By BARRY SCHWEID
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — In a stark reversal, the Clinton administration has delivered a stern message to ethnic Albanian leaders in Kosovo that U.S. and other NATO peacekeepers are determined to defend the border against their crossover attacks on civilians in Serbia.

The message was delivered this week by James P. Rubin, the State Department spokesman, in meetings with Ibrahim Rugova, the president of Kosovo's largest political party; Hashim Thaci, the former political leader of Kosovo's rebels; and others.

"I believe they understand the seriousness of the situation and that we are coming at them as a friend," Rubin said in an interview Wednesday on his return from what likely is to be his last diplomatic mission. "I hope they will do more to prevent these things from happening."

Some 200 ethnic Albanian guerillas are believed to have crossed the border into Serbia to attack Serbs, their villages and homes.

More than a year ago, similar attacks on police and other Serbs in Kosovo prompted Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic to drive hundreds of thousands of Albanians from the province.

This, in turn, triggered a NATO bombardment of the Serbs, expelling the Serbian troops and special police.

In the end, ethnic Albanians took control of Kosovo from Yugoslavia.

While the current forays against Serbs in the Presevo Valley is on a smaller scale than the earlier Albanian provocation in Kosovo, the violence worries the Clinton administration.

"We are determined to police the border and not allow this kind of cross-border activity," Rubin said.

The Kosovo Liberation Army, which spearheaded the rebellion against Belgrade, doesn't want a confrontation with the peacekeeping troops, Rubin said. "They are very careful of this."

L.A. police chief refuses to cooperate with district attorney

By TOM VERDIN
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES — The investigation into one of the worst scandals in the history of this city's police department degenerated into a free-for-all Wednesday after the police chief refused to cooperate with the district attorney.

"I think it sounds absolutely insane," said City Councilwoman Laura Chick. "Certainly, we need government agencies working together — not quibbling, not pointing fingers at each other."

Chief Bernard C. Parks, criticizing local prosecutors for moving too slowly in bringing charges against corrupt officers, ordered his department to withhold information gathered during its own inquiry.

It is the latest and most inflammatory confrontation in a widening corruption scandal that has tarnished the Los Angeles Police Department and now threatens to contaminate several other agencies in city and county government.

The chief's defiance prompted the state attorney general's office to examine the controversy, and the Los Angeles city attorney requested a special meeting of the city's police commission.

"This is really like a schoolyard brawl where the adult authorities have to come in and get everybody to cooperate," said Laurie Levenson, a professor at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles.

The corruption scandal centers on a group of rogue anti-gang officers in the department's Rampart division who framed, bullied and sometimes shot innocent people. At least 29 officers have been relieved of duty, and dozens of criminal convictions have been overturned.

Veteran undercover officer Rafael Perez was convicted of stealing cocaine from a police evidence locker. In exchange for a five-year prison sentence, he identified dozens of fellow cops whom he said abused their power and maintained a code of silence between 1995 and 1998.

The district attorney's office has yet to file charges against any officer implicated in the corruption, fearing that moving too swiftly could jeopardize cases.

The lack of criminal action against officers has angered Parks, who invited the FBI to join the investigation several weeks ago without informing District Attorney Gil Garcetti.

A March 8 letter Parks wrote to the district attorney's office notes the police department's desire to bring swift prosecution of officers accused of misconduct.

"Continued delay endangers criminal prosecutions and our department's administrative disciplinary procedures," Parks wrote.

The letter also outlined a new approach to the department's role in the investigation, saying its top priority will be to give material to the U.S. Attorney's office.

Garcetti contends his office is the lead agency in the case.

Federal prosecutors last month announced they would join the corruption investigation by working with both the district attorney's office and police.

"The department fully intends to support and pursue any indictment decisions or recommendations made by the United States Attorney as our first option," Parks wrote.

The U.S. Attorney's office did not immediately return a phone call seeking comment.

Dow Jones gains 300 points

By EILEEN GLANTON
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — The Dow Jones industrial average soared more than 300 points Wednesday as investors who sold off technology stocks this week put their money back into the long-forgotten industrial sector.

The Dow rose 320.17, or by 3.3 percent, to close at 10,131.41. It was the fourth-biggest point gain ever for the Dow, but wasn't close to a record in percentage terms.

The blue chip index rose as much as 368.41 points before slipping back a bit.

Meanwhile, investors continued shedding technology shares. The Nasdaq composite index fell 124.01 to close at 4,582.62, bringing its loss for the past three days to 465 points, or 9.2 percent.

The Standard & Poor's 500 rose 32.99 to 1,392.14 and the Russell 2000 index of smaller companies fell 14.12 to 558.87.

"What a rare day," said Vernon Winters, chief investment officer at Mellon Private Asset Management. "A lot of money managers have been forced to sell blue chips to buy technology stocks, and today, they're reversing course."

The blue chip Dow, which has dramatically underperformed the Nasdaq so far this year, rose on the strength of old-line industrial companies including DuPont, up 2 15/16 to 50 3/4, Johnson &

Johnson, up 4 3/16 to 76 15/16 and 3M, up 3 3/8 to 82 1/2.

J.P. Morgan rose 6 7/16 to 117 1/2 and United Technologies rose 3 15/16 to 53 7/8.

"So much damage has already been done in these old economy stocks," said Arthur Hogan, chief market analyst at Jefferies & Co. "We're finally seeing money coming into some of the bargain stocks that have been created by the selling pressure of the past few weeks."

Blue chip technology shares were mixed. Intel rose 2 5/16 to 120 3/16, but Hewlett-Packard fell 8 7/8 to 130 7/8.

Even with Wednesday's dramatic gains, the Dow remains down about 12 percent in the year to date, while the Nasdaq is up nearly 13 percent.

Weakness in some of the Nasdaq's top performers suggested that investors are taking profits from their sharp gains this year, analysts said.

"The Nasdaq has been on a rocket ship, and I think investors will work a bit harder to bring it down before it can start moving higher again," Hogan said. "The Nasdaq is in the midst of a corrective process, which is healthy."

Semiconductor components maker PMC-Sierra, which had risen 143 percent in the year to date, fell 32 to 186. Veritas, a developer of storage-management software that was had gained about 75 percent, fell 21 5/16 to 133 7/16.

Oracle rose 1 5/8 to 78 5/8. The company, a leading maker of business software, said after the close of trading Tuesday its third-quarter profits soared 160 percent, easily surpassing analysts' estimates.

Traders said the market's continued volatility suggested investors were nervous in the days ahead of the government's reports on the Producer Price Index and the Consumer Price Index.

The PPI, due for release Thursday, and the CPI, due out Friday, are closely watched gauges of inflationary pressures.

The Federal Reserve is expected to take both reports under consideration when it meets next Tuesday to discuss interest rates.

Many on Wall Street expect the Fed to raise rates.

An increase would be the fifth since June, when the Fed began trying to engineer a gradual slowdown in the economy to prevent inflation.

Mark Keller, chairman of the investment policy committee at A.G. Edwards & Sons in St. Louis, said he expects rising interest rates to eventually take a toll on technology stocks, which have kept up far better than the broad market in the months since the Fed began raising rates.

Those concerns prompted Keller to cut back on the firm's exposure to stocks Wednesday.

A.G. Edwards shifted its asset allocation model to include 55 percent stocks, 35 percent bonds and 10 percent cash.
